One common error with regard to suffixes should be guarded against, viz. that of mis-dividing a word so as to give the suffix a false shape. This is extremely common in such words as logi-c, civi-c, belli-c-ose, where the suffix is commonly spoken of as being -ic or -ic-ose. This error occurs, for instance, in the elaborate book on English Affixes by S. S. Haldemann, published at Philadelphia in 1865; a work which is of considerable use as containing a very full account, with numerous examples, of suffixes and prefixes. But the author does not seem really to have understood the matter, and indulges in some of the most extraordinary freaks, actually deriving musk from 'Welsh mus (from mu, that is forward, and us, that is impulsive), that starts out, an effluvium;' p. 74. But the truth is that civi-c (Lat. ciuius) is derived from Lat. ciui-, crude form of ciuis, a citizen, with the suffix -cus (Aryan -KA); and logi-c is from Gk. λογικός, from λογι-, put for λογο-, crude form of λογος, a discourse, with the suffix -kos (Aryan -KA) as before. Compare Lat. ciui-tas, Gk. λογο-μαχία. Belli-c-ose, Lat. bellicosus, is from Lat. belli-, put for bello-, crude form of bellum, war, with suffix -e-ōsus (Aryan -ka-want-a, altered to -ka-wans-a; Schleicher, § 218). Of course, words in -i-c are so numerous that -ic has come to be regarded as a suffix at the present day, so that we do not hesitate to form Volta-ic as an adjective of Volta; but this is English misuse, not Latin etymology. Moreover, since both -i- and -ka are Aryan suffixes, such a suffix as -i-kos, -i-cus, is possible both in Greek and Latin; but it does not occur in the particular words above cited, and we must be careful to distinguish between a suffixed vowel and an essential part of a stem, if we desire to understand the matter clearly.

One more word of warning may perhaps suffice. If we wish to understand a suffix, we must employ comparative philology, and not consider English as an absolutely isolated language, with laws different from those of other languages of the Aryan family. Thus the -th in tru-th is the -ð of A. S. treōw-ð, gen. case treōw-ðe, fem. sb. This suffix answers to that seen in Goth gabaur-ths, birth, gen. case gabaur-thais, fem. sb., belonging to the -i- stem declension of Gothic strong substantives. The true suffix is therefore to be expressed as Goth. -thi, cognate with Aryan -ti, so extremely common in Latin; cf. do-ti, dowry, men-ti, mind, mor-ti, death, mes-si- (= met-ti-), harvest, that which is mown. Hence, when Horne Tooke gave his famous etymology of truth as being 'that which a man trōweth,' he did in reality suggest that the -ti in Lat. mor-ti is identical with the -i in mori-t-ur or in ama-t; in other words, it was a mere whim.

III. LIST OF ARYAN ROOTS.

The following is a brief list of the principal Aryan roots occurring in English. A few, of which examples are either very scanty or very doubtful, are not noticed. Many of the roots here given are of considerable importance, and can be abundantly illustrated. I have added, at the end of the brief account of each root, several miscellaneous examples of derivatives; but these lists are by no means exhaustive, nor are they arranged in any very definite order beyond the separation into groups of the words of Greek, Latin, and Teutonic origin.

The references 'F.', 'C.', and 'V.', given under each root, are, respectively, to 'Fick, Vergleichendes Wörterbuch der Indogermanischen Sprachen, 3rd ed., Göttingen, 1874;' to 'Curtius, Greek Etymology, English edition, translated by Wilkins and England;' and to 'Vaniček, Griechisch-Lateinisches Etymologisches Wörterbuch, Leipzig, 1877.' These books have been chosen as giving the results of modern comparative philology in a convenient and accessible form. It is to be remembered that the honour of achieving such results is rather due, in many instances, to their predecessors, and especially, in the field of Teutonic philology, to Jacob Grimm.

When I cite these authorities, I do not mean that they all agree in giving the same result as that which I here present. In a great many cases they do so, and the result may then be considered as certain, or, at any rate, as universally admitted by all students who adopt the usual method of comparing the various languages of the Aryan or 'Indo-Germanic' family of languages. In other cases, one of the three differs from the views expressed by the other two; and I have then adopted the view which seemed to me most reasonable. Throughout, I have tried to compile a good practical list, though I am well aware that a few roots have been included of rather a speculative character, and of which the proofs are not so sure as might be wished.

The account of each root is, in every case, very brief, and mentions only a few characteristic words. Further information may be obtained in the authorities cited. The English examples are fully accounted for in the present work. Thus the reader who is curious to know how the word slave is connected with $\sqrt{\text{KRU}}$, to hear, has only to look out that word, and he will find the solution given. Many such examples are very curious, and afford good exercise in philology.

Instead of giving Grimm's law in the usual form, I have adopted Fick's modification of it, as being much simpler. It saves a great deal of trouble to leave out of consideration the Old High-German forms, and to use the word 'Teutonic' as inclusive of everything but High-German (commonly called German), thus reducing the number of varying forms, as due to 'sound-shifting' of the consonants, from three to two. As far as English philology is concerned, the 'German' forms are of comparatively small consequence; and, by not attempting to account for them exactly, we are usually able, with sufficient accuracy, to bring the various spellings of a word under one 'Teutonic' form, whether the language be Gothic, Anglo-Saxon, Friesian, Old-Saxon, Low German (proper), Icelandic, Swedish, or Danish. This being premised, I proceed to give a short and easy method for the conversion of 'Aryan,' or, as they might be called, 'classical' roots into Teutonic roots; it being understood that the 'classical' forms, Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit, differ but slightly from the Aryan forms, though each language has ways of its own of representing certain original sounds. (Some of these modifications are noticed below.)

Let the student learn by heart (it is easy enough) the following scheme.

Gutturals; viz. g, k, gh, g.

Labials; viz. b, p, bh, b.

This is absolutely all that need be remembered; it only remains to explain what the scheme means.

The repetition of g, d, b, is intentional, and essential to keeping everything in due order. The scheme is to be read with the following meaning. When guttural letters occur (especially at the beginning of a word, for in other positions the rule is more liable to exception), an Aryan g answers to Teutonic (English) k; an Aryan k answers to Teutonic gh; and an Aryan gh answers to Teutonic g.

When dental letters occur, Aryan d becomes Teutonic t; Aryan t becomes Teutonic dh; Aryan dh becomes Teutonic d.

When labial letters occur, Aryan b becomes Teutonic p [it is doubtful whether there is any real example of this particular change]; an Aryan p becomes Teutonic bh; and an Aryan bh becomes Teutonic b. Recurring to the scheme, we see that each 'Aryan' letter passes into the one following it in the scheme, thereby becoming 'Teutonic.' Once more, learn by heart; g, k, gh, g; d, t, dh, d; b, p, bh, b. Begin each set, respectively, with g for guttural, d for dental, and b for labial [of which word b is the middle consonant]. This is a very easy method, and can be put into practice at an instant's notice, without even any thought as to what the powers of the letters are.

In practice, inevitable modifications take place, the principal ones being these. (I do not give them all.)

ARYAN. For k, Latin writes c (but the c is hard, like k).

For gh (i.e. for g as used in the above scheme), Sanskrit has gh; Greek has χ; Latin has k initially (which k sometimes disappears altogether), or sometimes f.

For dh (as in the scheme), Sanskrit has dh; Greek has θ; Latin has f.

For bh (in the scheme), Sanskrit has bh; Greek has φ; Latin has f. Note particularly the threefold use of the troublesome Latin f; it may mean either gh, or dh, or bh.

TEUTONIC. For k, Anglo-Saxon writes c (but it is hard, like k). For gh, Teutonic languages write h. For dh, Anglo-Saxon has the symbol þ or ð, used convertibly in the MSS. For bh, Teutonic languages write f.

Now learn the following selected examples, which include nearly all that is practically wanted.

Gutturals (g, k, gh, g). Latin genus = E. kin, from $\sqrt{\text{GAN}}$; $\sqrt{\text{G}}$

Lat. cor (stem cord-) = Gk. καρδία = E. heart, from $\sqrt{\text{KARD}}$; Lat. fel = Gk. χολή = E. gall, from $\sqrt{\text{GHAR}}$, to be yellow.

Dentals. Lat. duo = E. two; Lat. tres = E. three; Lat. facere is allied to Gk. τίθημι, I place = E. do (to put), from $\sqrt{\text{DHA}}$.

Labials. Lat. pes (stem ped-) = Gk. ποῦς (stem ποδ-) = E. foot, from $\sqrt{\text{PAD}}$; Lat. ferre = Gk. φέρειν = E. bear.

Conversely, to reduce Teutonic forms to Aryan, use the same scheme, working backwards from the end to the beginning; thus E. g = Aryan gh; E. gh (h) = Aryan k; and E. k = Aryan g.

When so much as this has been acquired, it is easy to proceed to find the Old High German forms, if wanted; these require a second shifting, and that is all. Thus Aryan g = E. k = G. gh; or, to take an example, Lat. genus = E. kin = O. High G. chunni. But the changes into High German are found, in practice, to be much less regular, and the phenomena strongly support the theory that Old High German is merely a later development of the earliest forms of Low German. It is a great objection to the term 'Indo-Germanic' that the language specifically called 'German' is, philologically, the very worst representative of the Teutonic languages that could possibly have been chosen. The best representative is the Gothic, after which come Anglo-Saxon and Icelandic.

This brief sketch is all that can here be given; but in order fully to understand the examples below, the peculiarities of Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, Lithuanian, Russian, Gothic, &c., must be studied and allowed for. For example, when two aspirated letters appear in the same root, both aspirations disappear in Sanskrit, so that the $\sqrt{\text{DHIGH}}$ appears as dh. Greek admits one aspirate, but not two; 'every school-boy knows' that the genitive of θρίξ is τρίχ-ός, and that θρίχ-ός cannot stand. And even when all the consonants are understood, the vowels have to be mastered before the truth can be fully perceived. Thus the E. word home is A. S. hām. But in this word hām, the d really stands for ai, from original i; and (the m being a mere suffix) the form of the root is not KA, but KI. This is one of the things which no school-boy knows, nor will ever know during the present century.

The roots are arranged according to the alphabetical order of the Sanskrit alphabet, by help of which we obtain an Aryan alphabet, as follows: a, i, u, ai, au; k, g, gh; t, d, dh, n; p, b, bh, m; y, r, l, w; s. If this arrangement causes any trouble in finding a root, the reader has only to consult the index appended to the list, which is arranged in the usual English order. Forms in thick type, as AK, are Aryan; forms in parenthesis, as AH, are Teutonic.

1. $\sqrt{\text{AK}}$ (= $\sqrt{\text{AH}}$), to pierce, to be sharp, to be quick. Skt. ag, to pervade, attain (a secondary sense); ag-va, a (swift) horse; Gk. ak-pos, pointed, ak-ónē, whet-stone, ak-on, javelin, ak-mē, edge, ir-ros, a horse; Lat. ac-us, needle, ac-er, keen, sharp, ac-ure, to sharpen, ac-ies, edge, eq-us, a horse; Goth. ah-ana, chaff (ear of corn), A. S. ecg, edge. F. iii. 475; C. i. 161. ii. 52; V. 4. Ex. acacia, acme, aconite, acrobat, hippopotamus; acid, acule, ague, aglet, equine, eager; edge, egg (2), ear (2), axe.

2. $\sqrt{\text{AK}}$ (= $\sqrt{\text{AH}}$), to see. (Gk. σπ-, for σκ-.) Skt. ak-sha, eye, ik-sh, to see; Gk. ὄψ-ομαι, I shall see, ὄψ-ις, sight, ὀφθαλμός, eye; Lat. oc-ulus, eye; Russ. ok-o, eye; Goth. aug-o, eye. F. i. 473; C. ii. 62; V. 8. Ex. optics, ophthalmist, antelope, canopy; ocular; eye.

3. $\sqrt{\text{AK}}$, to be dark. Gk. ἀχ-λός, darkness; Lith. ak-las, blind; Lat. aquilus, dark-coloured. Ex. aquiline, eagle.

4. $\sqrt{\text{AK}}$ or ANK (= $\sqrt{\text{AH}}$ or ANG), to bend. Skt. añch, to bend, curve; Gk. ἀγκ-ών, ἄγκ-ος, a bend; Lat. unc-us, curved, ang-ulus, an angle; A. S. ang-el, a hook. F. i. 473; C. i. 160; V. 2. Ex. anchor, angle (1); ankle, angle (2), awkward.

5. $\sqrt{\text{AG}}$ (= $\sqrt{\text{AK}}$), to drive, urge, conduct. Skt. aj, to drive; Gk. ἀγ-εω; Lat. ag-ere; Icel. ak-a (pt. t. ók), to drive. F. i. 478; C. i. 208; V. 14. Ex. agony, axiom; agent, axis, agile; acre, acorn, ache, axle.

6. $\sqrt{\text{AGH}}$, to say, speak. Skt. ah, to speak; Lat. ā-io, I say, ad-ag-ium, a saying. F. i. 481; V. 20. Ex. adage, negation.

7. $\sqrt{\text{AGH}}$, to be in want. Gk. ἀχ-ήν, poor, needy; Lat. eg-ere, to be in want. F. i. 482; C. i. 234; V. 21. Ex. indigent.

8. $\sqrt{\text{AGH}}$ or ANGH (= $\sqrt{\text{AG}}$ or ANG), to choke, strangle, compress, afflict, frighten. Skt. amh-as, pain, ak-i, a snake, agh-a, sin; Gk. ἀγχ-εω, to strangle, ἀχ-ομαι, I am vexed, ἀχ-ος, anguish; Lat. ang-ere, to choke, ang-ina, quinsy, anx-ius, distressed, ang-uilla, eel; Goth. ag-is, fright, awe. F. i. 481; C. i. 234; V. 22. Ex. quinsy (= squin-anc-y); anger, anguish, anxious; ail, awe, eel, ugly.

9. $\sqrt{\text{AD}}$ (= $\sqrt{\text{AT}}$), to eat. Skt. ad, to eat; Gk. ēd-eiv; Lat. ed-ere; Goth. it-an, A. S. et-an, to eat. F. i. 483; C. i. 296; V. 24. Ex. anodyne; edible; eat, fret, ort; perhaps dental and tooth.

10. $\sqrt{\text{AD}}$, to smell. Gk. ὀδ-εω (= ὀδ-εω), to smell, pt. t. ὀδ-ωδ-a; Lat. od-or, odour, ol-ere (for od-ere), to smell. F. i. 484; C. i. 302; V. 26. Ex. ozone; odour, olfactory, redolent.

11. ✓ AN, to breathe. Skt. an, to breathe, Goth. uz-anan, to breathe out or expire; Gk. ἀν-εμος, wind; Lat. an-imus, spirit. F. i. 485; C. i. 380; V. 28. Ex. anemone; animal, animosity, &c. ¶ According to Fick, oral belongs here; but Curtius refers it to AS, to be; which see.
12. Base ANA, this, that; demonstrative pronoun. Skt. ana, this; Lat. ille, O. Lat. ollus (put for onu-lus); Lat. ul-tra, beyond. ¶ Here belong Gk. ἀνά, ἐν, Lat. in; see the list of Prefixes. Hence the comp. form Goth. an-thar, other, second, A.S. öðer. Ex. ulterior, outrage, other.
- ¶ For ✓ ANK and ✓ ANGH, see nos. 4 and 8.
13. ✓ ANG, to anoint, smear. Skt. añj, to anoint; Lat. unguere, to anoint. F. i. 479; C. ii. 306; V. 20. Ex. unguent, ancient, ointment.
14. ✓ AP, to seize, attain, bind; to work. Skt. āp, to attain, āp-ta, fit, ap-as, work; Gk. ἀπ-ρεω, to bind; Lat. ap-ere, to join together, ap-isci, to seize, get, ap-tus, fit; op-us, work, op-es, wealth, op-tare, to wish (try to get), op-timus, best. F. i. 489; V. 32. Ex. apse; apt, adapt, adept, adopt, operate, opinion, optative, opulent, copy, copious, optimist; (probably) if.
15. ✓ AM, to take. Lat. em-ere, to take, buy; Lith. im-ti, to take; Russ. im-ięte, to have. Ex. exempt, redeem, example, premium, prompt, vintage.
16. ✓ AR, sometimes AL, to raise, move, go. Skt. ri, to go, move; Gk. ἐρ-χουμαι, I go, ἤλ-θον, I went, ἐρ-νυμι, I excite, stir up, ἐρ-νις, a bird; Lat. al-acere, quick, or iri, to arise, ad-ol-escere, to grow up, al-ere, to nourish, al-tus, raised, high, Goth. al-an, to nourish, ri-nnan, to run, Icel. er-n, vigorous; &c. F. i. 493; C. i. 432; V. 41. Ex. ornithology, proselyte, metal; aliment, allegro, adult, origin, order, abortion, altar; earnest (1), elbow, run, old, &c.; also rask (1).
17. ✓ AR, to drive, to row; probably the same as the root above. Skt. ri, to go, move, ar-itra, a rudder; Gk. ἑρ-έσσειν, to row, ἑρ-ερός, an oar; Lith. ir-ti, to row; Lat. r-emus, an oar; A.S. ār, an oar; rō-wan, to row. F. i. 495; C. i. 427; V. 49. Ex. trireme; oar, row (2), rudder.
18. ✓ AR, to plough. Gk. ἀρ-έειν, Lat. ar-are, Goth. ar-jan, A.S. er-ian, to plough. F. i. 496; C. i. 426; V. 49. Ex. arable; ear (3).
19. ✓ AR, to gain, acquire, fit; the same as ✓ RA, to fit, which see. Skt. ri, to gain, attain, ar-a, spoke of a wheel, Gk. ἀρ-μενος, fitted, ἀρ-ρον, joint, limb, ἀρ-θμός, reckoning, series, number, ἀρ-μός, joint, shoulder, ἀρ-ετή, excellence, Lat. ar-mus, ar-tus, a limb, ar-s, skill, Goth. ar-ms, an arm, A.S. ear-m, arm. F. i. 493; C. i. 423; V. 46. Ex. aristocracy, harmony, arithmetical; arms, art; arm (1).
20. ✓ ARK, to protect, keep safe. Gk. ἀρκε-ειν, to keep off, suffice, ἀρκε-ή, defence; Lat. arcere, to keep, arca, a box. F. i. 22; V. 54. Ex. ark.
21. ✓ ARK, to shine. Skt. arch, to shine, ark-a, sun-beam; Gk. ἥλεκτ-τρον, amber, shining metal. F. i. 22; C. i. 168. Ex. arctic, electric.
22. ✓ ARG, to shine. Cf. no. 21. Skt. arj-una, white, rāj, to shine; Gk. ἀργ-υρος, silver; Lat. arg-ure, to make clear, arg-illa, white clay, arg-entum, silver. F. i. 23; C. i. 211; V. 57. Ex. argent, argillaceous, argue.
23. ✓ ARS, to flow, glide swiftly. Extension of ✓ AR, to move; no. 16. Skt. riśh, to flow; Lat. err-or (for ers-or *), a wandering; A.S. rās, swift flow. F. i. 499; V. 63. Ex. error; race (1).
24. ✓ AL, for original AR, to burn. A.S. æl-an, to burn, Icel. el-dr, fire; cf. Skt. ar-ūna, tawny. F. i. 500. Ex. anneal. (Perhaps area (?), arena, arid, ardent belong to ✓ AR, to burn, parch; V. 53.) But see ARENA in the Addenda.
- ¶ For another ✓ AL, see no. 16.
25. ✓ AW, to be pleased, be satisfied. Skt. av, to please, satisfy, Fick av, to be pleased; Gk. ἀισθάνομαι (= af-sthánomai), I perceive; Lat. au-ere, to desire, au-arus, greedy, ou-is, a sheep (orig. pet animal, tame), au-ris, ear, au-dire, to hear, perceive; Goth. au-i, sheep, ewe, au-so, ear. F. i. 501; C. i. 482, 487; V. 67. Ex. æsthetic; audience, avarice, ave, uncle; ear (1), ewe.
26. ✓ AW, to blow; the same as ✓ WA, to blow; see no. 330. Gk. ἀ-ήρ (for āf-ēp), air, ἀ-ήμι, I blow, Lat. au-ra, breeze, a-er, air, au-is, a bird. C. i. 483; V. 69. Ex. air, aviary, soar.
27. ✓ AS, to breathe, live, exist, be. Skt. as-u, vital breath, as, to exist, be; Gk. ἐσ-μι, ἐλ-μι, I am; Lat. s-um, I am, es-se, to be; ab-s-ens, being away, præ-s-ens, being present, s-ons, guilty; A.S. is, is, s-ōð, being, i.e. true, s-yn, sin; &c. F. i. 504; C. i. 468; V. 75. ¶ Probably Lat. ās, Skt. āśya, the month, belongs here (Curtius). Ex. suttee; paleontology, authentic, eu- (prefix); absent, present, essence, entity; am, art, is, are, sooth, sin; perhaps oral, &c.
28. ✓ AS, to throw, leave (or reject). Skt. as, to throw, leave; Gk. ἀσ-τέον, bone (rejected), ὄσ-τρον, shell, oyster; Lat. os, bone. F. i. 503; C. i. 258; V. 76. Ex. oyster, osseous, asprey.
29. Pron. base I, indicating the 3rd person; orig. demonstrative. Lat. i-s, he; Skt. i-dam, this. Hence AINA, one. O. Lat. onos, Lat. unus, Goth. ains, A.S. ān, one; &c. F. i. 505; V. 77. Ex. unity, union; one, only, alone.
30. ✓ I, to go. Skt. i, to go; Gk. ἐλ-μι, I go, al-έω, flux of time, time, age; Lat. i-re, to go, æ-nim, time; Goth. i-dāja, A.S. eo-de, I went. F. i. 506; C. i. 500; V. 79. Ex. isthmus; ambient, circuit, commence, count (1), exit, eyre, initial, issue, itinerant, obit, pellitory (1), perish, prator, preterit, proem, sedition, sudden; &c.
31. ✓ IK (= ✓ IG), to possess, own. Skt. ig, Goth. aigan, to possess. F. i. 507. Ex. owe, own (1), own (2).
32. ✓ ID (= ✓ IT), to swell. Gk. οἰδ-άειν, to swell; Lat. æ-midus, swollen; Russ. iad-ro, a kernel, bullet; A.S. āt-a, oats. F. i. 507; V. 84. Ex. oats.
33. ✓ IDH (= ✓ ID), to kindle. Skt. indh, to kindle; Gk. αἰθ-έω, to burn, αἰθ-ήρ, upper air; Lat. ad-es, orig. a hearth, æs-tas, summer; A.S. ād, funeral pile, ād-l, inflammation, disease. Ex. ether; edify, estuary; oast-house.
34. ✓ IS, to glide, move swiftly. Skt. ish, to speed; Gk. ι-ός, an arrow; Icel. eis-a, to speed. F. i. 509; V. 87. Ex. ice; perhaps iron.
35. ✓ IS, to be vigorous. Skt. ish-iras, vigorous; Gk. ι-σός, vigorous, holy. F. i. 509; C. i. 499; V. 87. Ex. hierarchy.
36. ✓ IS, to seek, wish for. Skt. ish, to wish, esh, to search; Gk. ι-ός, wish; Lat. æs-tumare, to value; Russ. is-kate, to seek; A.S. ās-cian, to ask. F. i. 508; C. i. 500; V. 88. Ex. aim, esteem; ask.
- ¶ ✓ UG, (1) to be wet, (2) to be strong; see nos. 336, 337.
- ¶ ✓ UD, to wet; see no. 339.
37. ✓ UL, to howl. Skt. ul-ūka, an owl; Gk. ὕλ-άω, I howl; Lat. ul-ul-are, to howl; A.S. ūl-e, an owl. F. i. 511; C. i. 463; V. 93. Ex. howl; owl.

draw. F. i. 598; V. 302. Ex. trace (1), q.v.; train, trait, treat, treatise, treaty, portrait, &c. Perhaps Gk. τρέχ-ειν, to run, belongs here; whence trochee.

138. ✓ TARP, to be satiated, enjoy; hence, to be gorged or torpid. (But Fick separates these senses.) Skt. trip, to be satiated, enjoy; Gk. τρέφ-ειν, to nourish, τέρπ-ειν, to delight; Lith. tarp-ti, to flourish, tarp-a, growth; Lat. torp-ere, to be torpid. F. i. 599; C. i. 276; V. 306. Ex. atrophy; torpid; perhaps sturdy.

139. ✓ TARS (= ✓ THARS), to be dry, to thirst. Skt. trish, to thirst; Gk. τέρο-μαι, to become dry, ταρσ-ία, τραρσ-ία, drying-kiln; Lat. torr-ere (for tors-ere) to parch, terr-a (for ters-a), dry ground; Goth. thaur-s-jan, to thirst, thaur-s-lei, thirst. F. i. 600; C. i. 276; V. 309. Ex. torrid, torrent, terrace, tureen, test, toast, terrier, inter, fumitory; thirst.

¶ For ✓ TAL, to lift, see no. 134.

140. ✓ TITH, to burn. Skt. tith-ā, fire; Gk. τῆ-ἄν, sun-god; Lat. tit-io, fire-brand. V. 311. Ex. Titan.

141. ✓ TU (= ✓ THU), to swell, be strong or large. Skt. tu, to increase, be powerful; Gk. τύ-λος, τύ-λη, a hard swelling; Lat. tu-mere, to swell, tu-ber, a round root, tu-multus, a tumult, Oscan tou-ta, a town, Lat. to-tus, all, whole of a thing (full assembly); Lith. tau-ka, fat of animals, tūk-ti, to become fat; A. S. þeð-h, thigh, thick part of the leg, þeð-w, custom (orig. muscle), þu-ma, the thumb (thick finger). F. i. 602, iii. 135; C. i. 278; V. 312. Ex. tumid, tumult, protuberance, total; thigh, thews, thumb, tungsten; Dutch, Teutonic.

¶ TUD, to strike; put for ✓ STUD, to strike; see no. 431.

142. ✓ TWAK (= ✓ THWAH), to dip, to wash. Skt. tuḡ, to sprinkle (Vedic); Gk. τέγ-γειν, to moisten; Lat. tingere, to dip; Goth. thwakh-an, to wash. F. i. 606; C. i. 270; V. 319. Ex. tinge, tint, tent (3); towel.

143. ✓ DA, to give. Skt. dā, to give; Zend. dā, to give; Gk. δί-δω-μι, I give, δό-σις, a gift, a dose; Lat. da-re, to give, do-num, a gift, do-s, dowry. F. i. 607; C. i. 293; V. 321. ¶ The pt. t. of Lat. dare is dedi; hence verbs like con-dere (pt. t. con-didi) are to be considered as compounds of dare, but they seem to have taken up the sense of ✓ DHA, to place, put, on which account they are frequently referred to that root. The form shews that they should rather be referred hither; the other root being rightly represented in Latin only by facere and its compounds. Ex. dose; dais, donation, dower, dowry; also add, edition, perdition, render, tradition, treason, traitor, veed, betray, abscound, sconce (1), sconce (2), &c.

150. ✓ DAM (= ✓ TAM), to tame. Skt. dam, to tame, dam-ana, subduing; Gk. δαμ-αίνω, to tame; Lat. dom-are, to tame, dom-inus, lord; Goth. ga-tam-jan, to tame; A. S. tam, tame. F. i. 613; C. i. 287; V. 340. Ex. adamant, diamond; don (2), duenna, dominion, dungeon, domino, dame, damsel; tame, also teem (2), q.v.

151. ✓ DAM (= ✓ TAM), to build. Gk. δῆμ-ειν, to build, δόμ-ος, building, room; Skt. dam-pati, master of a house; Lat. dom-us, a house; Goth. tim-rjan, tim-brjan, to build; A. S. tim-ber, timber. F. i. 613; C. i. 289; V. 343 (who connects domus with dominus; see the preceding root). Ex. dome, major-domo, domicile, domestic; timber.

152. ✓ DAR (= ✓ TAR), to tear, rend, rive. Skt. dri, to burst open, tear asunder; Gk. δέρ-ειν, to flay, δέρ-μα, skin; Zend dar, to cut; Lat. dol-are, to cut, hew, dol-or, pain, del-ere, to destroy; Russ. dra-te, to tear, dir-a, a rent; Goth. ga-tair-an, to break, destroy, A. S. ter-an, to tear. F. i. 615; C. i. 290; V. 343. Ex. epidermis, pachydermatous; doleful, dolour, condole, delete; tear (1), tire (1), tire (4); perhaps tilt (1) (but prob. not tree).

153. ✓ DAR, to sleep. Skt. drā, to sleep; Gk. δαρ-θάνειν, to fall asleep; Lat. dor-mire, to sleep; Russ. dre-mate, to sleep. F. i. 618; V. 348. Ex. dormitory, dormant, dormer-window.

154. ✓ DAR, to do. Gk. δρά-ειν, to do, effect, δρά-μα, a deed, act; Lith. dar-yti, to do. F. i. 619; C. i. 294; V. 349. Ex. drama, drastic.

155. ✓ DAR, also DAL (= ✓ TAL), to see, consider, regard, purpose; hence ✓ DAR-K, to see. Skt. dri, to consider, d-dar-a, regard, concern, care; hence drip, to see; Gk. δῶ-ος, cunning, δέρ-ομαι, I see; Lat. dol-us, cunning; Goth. ga-tils, suitable, convenient, A. S. tīl, profitable; O. H. G. zīl (G. ziel), aim, purpose; A. S. tal-u (order), number, narrative, tale; A. S. tīl-ian, to strive after, to till. F. i. 617; C. i. 294; V. 350. Skt. mú, mav, to bind, mú-ka, dumb; Gk. μύ-ειν, to close the eyes or mouth, μύ-σθης, initiated, μύ-σθριον, a secret; Lat. mu-tus, dumb; also (according to Vaníček) Lat. mu-rus, a wall, mu-nire, to fortify, mu-nus, an obligation, im-mu-nis, free, com-mu-nis (binding together), common. F. i. 726; C. i. 419; V. 731. Ex. mystic, mystery (1); mule (1), mural, munificence, muniment, ammunition, common, immunity; perhaps mow (2).

276. ✓ MU, to utter a slight suppressed sound, to utter a deep sound, to low, to mutter; see no. 265. Gk. μύ-ζειν, to make the sound mū, to mutter; Lat. mū-tum, a sound, mu-tire, to mutter, mumble; Russ. mui-chate, to low; E. moo, to low, mu-m, a slight sound. F. i. 726; C. i. 419; V. 679. Ex. myth, motto, mutter; mum, mumble, midge; possibly mosquito. Here also belong mock, mope, mow (3), mop (2).

277. ✓ MU, to move, push, strip off. Skt. miv, to shove, move, pp. mú-ia, moved (Fick); Lat. mou-ere, pp. mō-tus, moved, mu-tare, to change; Lith. mau-ti, to strip, už-mo-ua, a muff; O. H. G. muo-we, a muff. F. i. 726; C. i. 402; V. 734. Ex. move, motion, mew (3), moult, mutable, mobile, mob (1), moment, momentum; perhaps mutual; muff.

278. ✓ MUK, to loosen, dismiss, shed, cast away. Skt. much, to loosen, dismiss, shed, cast; Gk. μύκ-ος, mucus, μύκ-α, nozzle of a lamp; Lat. muc-us, mucus, e-mung-ere, to wipe clean. F. i. 727; C. i. 198; V. 737. Ex. match (2); mucus.

¶ ✓ MUR, to murmur; the same as ✓ MAR, to rustle; see no. 265.

279. ✓ MUS, to steal. Skt. mush, to steal, mush-a, a stealer, rat, mouse; Gk. μῦς, a mouse, muscle; Lat. mus, mouse, mus-culus, a little mouse, a muscle; A. S. mús, a mouse. F. i. 727; C. i. 422; V. 742. Ex. muscle, niche (q.v.); mouse.

280. Pronominal base YA; originally demonstrative, meaning 'that.' Skt. ya, who, orig. that; Gk. δ-ς (for yō-s), who; Lat. ia-m, now; A. S. geo-na, yon, geó, yea, gie-t, ge-t, gi-t, yet. F. i. 728; V. 745. Ex. yon, yea, yet, yes.

281. ✓ YA, to go (with long a); secondary form from I, to go; for which see above; no. 30. Hence ✓ YAK, to cause to go away, to throw (Curtius). Skt. yá, to go, to pass away, pp. yá-ta, gone, yá-tu, time; Gk. ῥῶ-ος, year, time, season (that which has passed away), ῥῶ-α, time, hour; Lat. ia-nua, a gate (way; cf. Skt. yá-na, going); Goth. je-r, A. S. gei-r, a year. Also (from YAK), Gk. láv-reu, to throw, Lat. iac-ere, to throw. F. i. 729; C. i. 443; V. 747. Ex. hour, horary; January, year. Also iambic; jet (1), adjacent, eject, ejaculation, &c.

282. ✓ YAG, to worship. Skt. yaj, to sacrifice, worship; Gk. ἄγ-ιος, ἄγ-ός, holy. F. i. 729; V. 754. Ex. hagiographa.

283. ✓ YAS, to ferment, seethe. Skt. yas, to exert oneself, nir-yás-a, an exudation; Gk. ζέ-ειν, perf. mid. ζέ-σθ-μαι, to seethe, ζέ-σθ-μα, a decoction, ζέ-σθ-ρός, sodden, ζῆ-λος, zeal; A. S. gis-t, yeast; O. H. G. jes-an (G. gähr-en), to ferment. F. i. 731; C. i. 471; V. 757. Ex. zeal, zealous, jealous; yeast.

284. ✓ YAS, to gird (with long a). Zend yáç-tó, girt; Gk. ζών-νυμι (for ζών-νυμι *), I gird, ζών-νη (for ζών-νη *), girdle, ζών-τήρ, girdle; Russ. po-ias, a girdle; Lith. jos-ta, a girdle. F. i. 731; C. ii. 263; V. 758. Ex. girdle.

285. ✓ YU, to keep back, defend, help (?). Skt. yu, to keep back; Lat. iu-uare, to help. So Fick, i. 732, who refers hither Skt. yu-van, Lat. iu-uenis, young, and all kindred words. But Curtius (i. 285) and Vaníček refer Lat. iu-uare and iu-uenis to ✓ DIW, to shine, connecting them with Lat. Iu-piter. Neither theory seems quite clear.

286. ✓ YU, to bind together, to mix; whence ✓ YUG, to join, for which see below. Skt. yu, to bind, join, mix, yú-sha, pease soup, broth; Zend yús, good (Fick); Gk. ζύ-μην, leaven, ζῶ-μος, broth; Lat. iu-s, broth, also iu-s, justice, right (that which binds), iu-stus, just, iu-rare, to swear (bind by oath). F. i. 733; C. ii. 262; V. 759. Ex. zymotic; juice, just (1), jury, adjust, adjure, &c.

287. ✓ YUG (= ✓ YUK), to join, yoke; an extension of ✓ YU, to bind (see above). Skt. yuj, to join, connect; yug-a, a yoke, pair; Gk. ζυγ-όν, yoke, ζεύγ-νυμι, I yoke; Lat. iug-ere, to join, iug-um, a yoke, con-iux, spouse, iux-ta, near; A. S. geoc, yoke. F. i. 734; C. i. 223; V. 760. Ex. syzygy; jugal, conjugal, join, junction; yoke.

288. ✓ RA, to fit; the same as ✓ AR, to gain, fit; see no. 19. Lat. re-or, to think, reckon (orig. to fit together); ra-tus, estimated, ra-tio, a reason; A. S. ri-m, number, rime. F. i. 737; V. 766. Ex. rate (1), reason, ration; rime (1).

289. ✓ RA, to rest, to be delighted, to love. Hence ✓ LAS, which see below; no. 324. Skt. ram, to rest, be delighted, love, sport, ra-ti, pleasure, passion, ram, to rejoice; Gk. ῥῶ-μ-ος, lonely, desert; ῥῶ-ος, love; Lith. rim-ti, to be quiet, ram-as, rest; A. S. ræ-st, rest. F. i. 735; C. i. 404; V. 768. Ex. erotic, hermit; rest (1), ram.

290. ✓ RA, also LA, to resound, bellow, roar; extended form RAS. See also ✓ RAK below; no. 292. Skt. ras, to roar, cry loudly; Lith. rė-ju, I scold; Lat. la-trare, to bark, la-mentum, a wailing; Russ. la-iate, to bark, scold; A. S. rá-rian (or rúr-ian), to roar. F. i. 737; V. 771. Ex. lament, roar; also low (2), q.v.

291. ✓ RA, another form of ✓ AR, to go, or to drive. Skt. ra-tha, a car, chariot, vehicle (from ri, to go); Lat. ra-tis, a ship, ro-ta, a wheel, whence ro-tare, to rotate, ro-tundus, round; Lith. rā-tas, a wheel, G. ra-d, a wheel. F. i. 737; C. i. 428; V. 50. Ex. rotate, rotund, round, rondeau, &c. Also barouche. Fick gives the root the sense of to fit, thus making it the same as ✓ AR, to fit. It seems much simpler to connect rat and rota with the sense 'to go, drive, or run.' Compare also row (2), rudder, run, rash (1).

292. ✓ RAK, also LAK, to croak, to speak. Skt. lap (for lak 1), to speak; Gk. ῥῶ-κ-ος, I cracked, resounded, λακ-ερός, resounding; Lat. rā-na (for rac-na *), a frog, loqu-i, to speak; Russ. riek, speech. F. i. 738; C. i. 196; V. 775. Ex. ranunculus, loquacious, colloquy, &c.

293. ✓ RAG (= ✓ RAK), to stretch, stretch out, reach, make straight, rule. Skt. arj, to acquire, rij, to stretch, rij-u, straight, right, rāj-an, king; Gk. δ-πέγ-ειν, to stretch; Lat. reg-ere, to rule, e-ri-g-ere, to erect, set upright, rec-tus (for reg-tus *), right, rex (stem reg), king; Goth. uf-rak-jan, to stretch out, raih-ts, right. F. i. 738; C. i. 226; V. 777. Ex. raja; regal, regent (q.v.), rigid, regulate, rule; rich, right, reach (1), rack (1), rank (2), rankle, rake (3), ratch.

294. ✓ RAG (= ✓ RAK), also LAG, to collect; hence to put together, to read. Gk. λέγ-ειν, to pick, collect, count, tell, speak, λόγ-ος, speech; Lat. leg-ere, to read, de-lec-tus, choice, lec-tus, chosen; Goth. rik-an, pt. t. rak, to collect; rah-njan, to reckon; A. S. rac-a, a rake. F. iii. 249; C. i. 454; V. 781. Ex. logic, and the suffix -logy; legend, delight, elect, &c.; reckon, rake (1).

295. ✓ RAG (= ✓ RAK), also LAG, to reckon, heed, care for. Gk. ἀ-λέγ-ειν, to regard; Lat. neg-leg-ere, not to regard, to disregard; re-lig-io, religious reverence; A. S. réc-an, to reckon; O. H. G. ruoh, care, heed. F. iii. 249; C. i. 454; V. 828. Ex. neglect, religion; reck.

296. ✓ RAGH, nasalised form RANGH or LANGH (= ✓ LANG), to spring forward, jump. Skt. rangh, to move swiftly, langh, to jump over, lagh-u, quick, light (of action), Vedic form ragh-u; Gk. ῥῶ-αχ-ός, small (orig. quick); Lat. le-uis (for leg-uis *), light; Lith. leng-was, light, easy; Russ. leg-kie, adj., light, leg-kiia, s. pl., lights, lungs; A. S. leoh-ta, Goth. leih-ts, light, A. S. lung-re, quickly, lightly, lang, long. F. i. 749; C. i. 191; V. 785. Ex. levity, alleviate; light (2), long (1), lungs, lights.

297. ✓ RAD (= ✓ RAT), to split, gnaw, scratch. Skt. rad, to split, dig, rad-a, a tooth, vajra-rad-a, a hog; Lat. rad-ere, to scratch, rare, rod-ere, to gnaw. F. i. 739; V. 787. Ex. rare, raze, razor, rail (2), rash (2), rodent, rostrum; probably rat.

298. ✓ RADH, or LADH, to quit, leave, forsake. Skt. rah (for orig. radh), to quit, leave; Gk. λανθ-άνειν, λανθ-ειν, to be unnoticed, lie hid, λήθ-η, oblivion; Lat. lat-ere, to lie hid. C. ii. 17; V. 787. Ex. Lethe, latent.

IV. DISTRIBUTION OF WORDS.

The following is an attempt to distribute the words in the English language so as to shew the sources to which they originally belonged. The words selected for the purpose are chiefly those given in large type in the dictionary, to the exclusion of mere derivatives of secondary importance. The English list appears short in proportion, chiefly because it contains a large number of these secondary words, such as helpful, happiness, heartly, and the like.

I have no doubt that, in some cases, the sources have been wrongly assigned, through ignorance. Some indulgence is requested, on account of the difficulty of making the attempt on a scale so comprehensive. The account of some words has been altered, by way of correction. The chief are: abyss, academy, accent, accept, accident, ace, advocate, acry, affray, agnail, agog, alabaster, albatross, alembic, allodial, ambuscade, ambush, anagram, anatomy, apocalypse, apocope, arabesque, archetype, askance, asperity, assay, assort, awe, baffle, bagatelle, balloon, ballot, balm, barouche, basil, bauble (2), beadle, beefeater, beryl, bestead, billion, blame, blaspheme, bouquet, bourn (1), bowline, braze (2), broil (1), broil (2), buffoon, bunion, burly, butler, cape (2), caricature, cassia, catamaran, chap (2), chervil, chicory, chintz, choir, chyme, cinchona, clog, closet, clove (1), cock (1), cockatrice, comb (2), compose, condense, contrive, cotton (1), counterpane (2), crochet, czar, dauphin, delta, depose, diaper, diatribe, dignify, dismay, dispose, dolphin, dome, drag, draggle, dragoon, dribble, drip, engross, entail, excuse, exhilarate, expose, fardel, felon, feud (2), feudal, fief, flatter, flout, fray (2), furnace, furbish, furl, gallias, garment, gloze, grail (2), grapple, grimalkin, groats, hale (2), haul, hobby (1), homicide, hubbub, hypotenuse, impose, ink, iota, irreconcilable, jade (2), laity, martingale, milch, mite (1), morris, orgies, overhaul, parricide (1), pate, penal, petroleum, petrify, piazza, plantain, poll, popinjay, prehistoric, punt (2), raccoon, sine, &c.

HYBRID WORDS. English abounds in hybrid words, i. e. in words made up from two different languages; and the two languages compounding the word are often brought into strange conjunction, as in the case of interloper, which is half Latin and half Dutch. The complexity thus caused is such as almost to defy classification, and, as the words are accounted for in the body of the work, each in its due place, I content myself with giving a list of them, in alphabetical order.

abroach, abut, across, affray, agog, akimbo, allodial, allot, allure, amaze, amiss, apace, apiece, archtrave, around, arouse, array, asafetida, attire, attune, awkward.

Of many other words the etymology is very obscure, the numerous solutions offered being mostly valueless.

V. SELECTED LIST OF EXAMPLES OF SOUND-SHIFTING, AS ILLUSTRATED BY ENGLISH.

On p. 730, I have given the ordinary rules for the sound-shifting of consonants, as exhibited by a comparison of Anglo-Saxon with Latin and Greek. I here give a select list of co-radicate words, i.e. of words ultimately from the same root, which actually illustrate Grimm's law within the compass of the language, owing to the numerous borrowings from Latin and Greek. Probably English is the only language in which such a comparison can be instituted, for which reason the following examples ought to have a peculiar interest. That the words here linked together are really co-radicate, is shewn in the Dictionary, and most of the examples are the merest common-places to the comparative philologist. The number (such as 87, &c.) added after each example refers to the number of the Aryan root as given on pp. 730-746.

1. Gutturals. Latin g becomes English k, often written as c. This k, in the word choose, has become ch; but the A.S. form is ceosan. The old word ake is now written ache, by a popular etymology which wrongly imagines the word to be Greek.

In the following examples, the first column contains words of Latin or Greek origin, whilst the second column contains words that are pure English.

(i)gnoble—know, 88.	gerund—cast, 100.
garrulous—care, 91.	gust (2)—choose, 105.
grain—corn, 94.	agent—ache, 5.

Latin k (written c) answers to English kk, written k. In the last five examples the initial k has been dropped in modern English.

canto—hen, 46.	cite—hie, 70.
capacious—have, 47.	cemetery—home, 72.
capital—head, 47.	custody—hide, 77.
current—horse, 52.	cup—hoop, 78.
culminate—hill, 53.	circus—(h)ring, 56.
kiln—hearth, 57.	cranny—(h)rend, 60.
calends—haul, 58.	in-cline—(h)lean (1), 80.
crate—hurdle, 61.	client—(h)loud, 81.
cell—hall, 64.	crude—(h)raw, 82.

Greek χ (written ch in English) answers to English g, which (in modern English) often becomes y initially. The corresponding Latin letter is k, sometimes f; see the last five examples.

cholera—gall, 111.	chyme—gush, 121.

chorus—yard (1), 113.	hiatus—yawn, 119.
eu-charist—yearn, 112.	furnace—glow, 110.

demon—time, 144.	dolour—tear (1), 152.
docile—teach, 145.	divine—Tuesday, 158.
diction—token, 145.	duke—tow (1), 160.
diamond—tame, 150.	ed-ible—eat, 9.

tolerate—thole (2), 134.	tumid—thumb, 141.

3. Labials. Latin and Greek p answers to English f.

polygon—full, 197.	plume—fly, 221.

dia-phragm—borough, 233.	ferreous—brad, 237.
phlox—bleak, 235.	fissure—bite, 240.
physic—be, 242.	future—be, 242.
phlebotomy—blood, 250.	fruit—brook (1), 243.
fate—ban, 224.	fugitive—bow (1), 244.
federal—band, 230.	fervent—brew, 246.
fertile—bear (1), 231.	fragile—break, 247.
farina—barley, 231.	flatulent—blow (1), 249.
per-forate—bore (1), 232.	flourish—bloom, 250.

ERRATA AND ADDENDA.

THE following notes and additions contain corrections of printer's errors, corrections of errors of my own, fresh quotations illustrative of the history of certain words, and additional illustrations of etymologies. It will be found that, of a few words, I entirely withdraw or greatly modify the account already given; such words are marked with the symbol [*] at the end of the article in the body of the work. In other cases, I have made but slight alterations, or have found fresh evidence to confirm results that before were (in some cases) doubtful; such words are marked with the symbol [†]. I have also added a few words, not mentioned in the body of the work; these are here marked by an asterisk preceding them.

The following list of after-thoughts is, I regret to say, still incomplete, partly from the nature of the case. Fresh evidence is constantly being adduced, and the best that I can do at present is to mention here such things as seem to be most essential. There must still be several corrections needed which, up to the present time, have escaped my notice.

ABACK. I give the M.E. abakke as it stands in the edition of Gower. Abak is better, answering exactly to A.S. onbæc.

ABLUTION. Perhaps French; Cotgrave gives 'Ablution, a washing away.' However, he does not use the E. word.

ABORIGINES, indigenous inhabitants. (L.) 'Calling them aborigines and abroxythoves;' Selden's notes to Drayton's Polyolbion, song 8. — Lat. aboriginēs, the ancestors of the Romans, the nations which, previous to historical record, drove out the Siculi (Lewis and Short). Coined from Lat. ab origine, where origine is the abl. of Lat. origo; see Origin.

β. This phrase is usually interpreted as meaning 'from the beginning;' but Dr. Guest suggests that it means men without origin, 'those who could be traced to no distinct origin, obscure, indigenous, and what might now be called prehistoric races;' Origines Celticae, i. 91. Cf. Lat. ab-sonus, dissonant, &c. But Virgil's use of ab origine, Æn. i. 372, 642, 753, x. 179, renders this suggestion very doubtful, and I think it should be decisively rejected. Der. aborigin-al.

ABROACH. Set abroach is a translation of the F. mis abroche, as it is written in the Liber Custumarum, p. 304.

ABSCOND, i. 4. The root is rather DA than DHA; see List of Roots, no. 143, p. 735, and the note upon it.

ABUT. 'The southe hede therof abbuityth vppon the wey leading from,' &c.; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 52; in a will dated 1479.

ACACIA. See Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xiii. c. 9, which treats 'of the Egyptian thorne acacia.'

ACADEMY. Not (F.,—Gk.), but (F.,—L.,—Gk.); as the context shews. The same correction applies to Alabaster, Almond, Amalgam, Anagram, Analogy, Anatomy, Baptize, Cataplasma, Celery, Centre, Chamber, Chimney, Chirurgion, &c.; which are unfortunately not marked (within brackets) with sufficient accuracy.

ACCENT. Probably from the French; viz. F. accent, 'an accent;' Cot. — L. accentum, acc. of accentus, &c.

ACCEPT. Not (L.), but (F.,—L.). From F. accepter, 'to accept;' Cot. — L. acceptare, &c.

ACOUTRE. I find O.F. acouter in the 12th century, which is earlier than any quotation given by Littré. 'Les hardeillons moult bien acoutre Desor son dos,' i.e. he (Renard) arranges the bundles very comfortably upon his back; Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française, 202, 23.

ACCRUE. The Anglo-French acru, accrued, pp., occurs in Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 415; spelt acru in Life of Edw. Conf., ed. Luard, l. 4025. The fut. sing. acrestera occurs in Stat. of the Realm, i. 156, an. 1309.

ACHE. The A.S. word is also written ece, A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 6, l. 19. We may go further, and derive the sb. from the strong verb acan (pt. t. ac, pp. acen), corresponding to the strong M.E. verb aken, already spoken of; we find acaþ mine eðgan = my eyes ache, Ælfric's Gram., ed. Zupitza, p. 216, l. 13 (various reading in footnote). Further, the orig. sense of acan was to drive, urge; it is cognate with Icel. aka, to drive, pt. t. ök, pp. ekinn, and with Lat. agere, to drive. From ✓AG, to drive; see Agent. From the same root are acre and acorn. It follows that any connection between ache and áxos is impossible.

ACID. We find also F. acide, 'sourer;' Cot. But it is more likely that the word was taken directly from Latin, considering its use by Bacon.

ACOLYTE. Not (F.,—Gk.), but rather (F.,—Low L.,—Gk.), though it makes but little difference. The same remark applies to Allegory, Almanac, Anchoret, Apostasy, Apostate, Barge, Bark (1), Calender, Calm, Carbine, Card (1), Carte, Catalogue, Canterise, Celandine, Chronicle, Clergy, Climacter, Climate, Clinical, &c. But see remark on Bark (1) below.

ADDLED. I have copied the etymology from former dictionaries without sufficient heedfulness. The etymology from A.S. ādle is not right; this word would have passed into a mod. E. odle, with long o. Addle corresponds to M.E. adel, as in the expression adel eye, i.e. addle egg, Owl and Nightingale, 133. From A.S. adela, mud, Grein, i. 1 (with a reference to Grimm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, i. 177). Thus the orig. sense of addle, adj., was simply 'muddy,' a sense still retained in prov. E. addle-pool. Stratmann also cites the O. Low G. adele, mud, from the Mittelniederdeutsches Wörterbuch by Schiller and Lübben, Bremen, 1875. Cf. also Lowl. Scotch addle dub, a filthy pool (new ed. of Jamieson); O. Swed. adel, urine of cattle (Ihre); E. Friesic adel, dung, adelig, foul, adelpöl, an addle pool (Koolman). Quite distinct from A.S. ādle, though Koolman seems to confuse these words, as many others have done.

ADJUST. Littré makes two O.F. ajuster: 1 = adjūxtare*, 2 = adjūstare* (both common in Med. Lat.). Mr. H. Nicol in private letter had pointed out that O.Fr. had only ajuster, ajuster = adjūxtare, and that Med. Lat. adjustare was a purely artificial word formed later on Fr. ajuster. Ajuster, later Ajouter, adjouter, gave a M.E. aiust, adjoust common in "adjoust feyth," Fr. adjouster foy. This was already observable to Palgrave. Fr. ajouster became adjouter, ajouter, whence a 16th cent. Eng. adjute, to add, explained by Dr. Johnson as from Lat. adjūtare. In 16th cent. a new Fr. adjuster, ajuster was formed probably from Med. Lat. adjustare, but perhaps from Ital. aggiustare (= adjūxtare), or even from Fr. à + juste. This English has adopted as adjust. Note by Dr. Murray, Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880. The result is that my explanation of M.E. aiusten is quite right; but the mod. E. adjust appears to be not the same word, the older word being displaced by a new formation from Lat. iustus.

ADMIRAL. Also Amiral, ultimately from Arabic Amīr, Emīr, Ameer, commander, imperator, cf. amara, to order. In opposition to recent suggestions, he [Dr. Murray] maintained that the final -al was the Arabic article, present in all the Arabic and Turkish titles containing the word, as Amir-al-umrin, Ruler of rulers, Amir-al-bahr, commander of the sea. The first instance of such a title is Amir-al-mumūnim, commander of the faithful, assumed by the Caliph Omar, and first mentioned by Eutychius of Alexandria among Christian writers. Christians ignorant of Arabic, hearing Amir-al- as the constant part of all these titles, naturally took it as one word; it would have been curious if they had done otherwise. But, of course, the countless perversions of the word, Amiralis, Amiralis, Amiraldus, Amiraud, Amirand, amirandus, amirante, almirante, admirabilis, Admiratus, etc., etc., were attempts of the "sparrow-grass" kind to make the foreign word more familiar or more intelligible. As well known, it was used in Prov., O. Fr., and Eng. for Saracen commander generally, a sense common in all the romances, and still in Caxton. The modern marine sense is due to the Amir-al-bahr, or Ameer of the sea, created by the Arabs in Sicily, continued by the Christian kings as Admiralius maris, and adopted successively by the Genoese, French, and English under Edw. III as "Amyrel of the Se" (Capgrave), or "Admyrall of the navy" (Fabyan). But after 1500, when it became obsolete in the general sense, we find "the Admiral" used without "of the Sea" as now. The ad- is well known to be due to popular confusion with admirari; a common title of the Sultans was Admirabilis mundi, and vice versa in English admiral was often used as an adjective = admirable. Note by Dr. Murray, Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880.

ADVENTURE, i. 7. The O. F. aventure is derived rather from Low L. adventura, an adventure, a sb. analogous to Lat. sbs. in -tura. Latin abounds with such sbs., ending (nearly always) in -tura or -sura; see a list of some in Roby's Latin Grammar, 3rd ed. pt. i. § 893. Roby describes them as 'Substantives; all feminine, with similar formation to that of the future participle. These words denote employment or result, and may be compared with the names of agents in -tor.' I regret that, in the case of a great many words ending in -ure, I have given the derivation as if from the future participle. This is, of course, incorrect, though it makes no real difference as to the form of the word. I must ask the reader to bear this in mind, and apply suitable corrections in the case of similar words, such as Feature, Garniture (s. v. Garnish), Gesture, Judicature, Juncture. To the list of derived words add per-adventure.

ADWOWSON. In Anglo-French it is spelt avueson, Year-Books of Edw. I., i. 77; avoueson, id. 409; avoeson, Stat. of Realm, i. 293, an. 1340.

AERY. The derivation of Low Latin area remains obscure. The word may be described as simply '(F.)', as little more is known about it. Note that Drayton turns aery into a verb. 'And where the phenix aeries' [builds her nest]; Muses' Elysium, Nymphal 3.

ÆSTHETIC. Really imitated from German; the G. word being from the Gk. 'His Vorschule der Æsthetik (Introduction to Æsthetics)'; Carlyle, Essay on Richter, in Edinb. Rev., June, 1827, p. 183; Essays, i. 8 (pop. edition). Carlyle seems to have used the word here for the first time in English; see Baumgarten's Æsthetica, 1750.

AFFRAY. I print Mr. H. Nicol's excellent remarks in full. 'Affray (and fray), obs. verb (whence afraid), to frighten; affray (and fray), subst., a quarrel, fight. In this word it is the remoter derivation I have to correct, and the correction is not my own, being due to Prof. G. Paris (Romania, 1878, v. 7, p. 121); the reason of my bringing it forward is that it explains the Mod. Eng. meaning of the substantive. (Parenthetically let me remark that afraid, in spite of its spelling, has not become an adjective, as stated in Mahn's Webster, but remains a participle; it is not used attributively, and it forms its absolute superlative with much, not with very.) The derivation of F. effrayer, to frighten, effroi, fright, given by Diez, and generally accepted, is from a hypothetical Lat. exfrigidare, and this was corroborated by Provençal esfreidar; the original meaning would therefore be "to freeze" or "chill." But, as M. Paris has pointed out, exfrigidare, though satisfactory as to meaning, is the reverse as to sounds. First, frigidus keeps its d in all its known French derivatives, the loss of the unaccented i, by bringing the g in contact with the d, having (as in roide from rigidum) protected the latter consonant from weakening and subsequent disappearance. This difficulty is met by M. Scheler's proposal of exfrigere instead of exfrigidare; but this involves the change, unparalleled in Old F., to the first conjugation of a Lat. verb of another conjugation, and fails to meet the equally serious second objection. This is, that the Old French verb at first has the diphthong ei only in the stem-accented forms, the others having simple e, and has simple é for Lat. ā in accented inflexions; thus while the 1st sing. pres. ind. is esfrei, the infinitive is esfreer, with two simple vowels. This shows that the original stem-vowel was followed by simple d or t, not by g or k, with which it would have given the diphthong ei in the stem-syllable whether accented or unaccented, and the diphthong ie for Latin ā in accented terminations; thus O. Fr. freier (Mod. F. frayer, E. fray, to rub) from Lat. fricāre, has the two diphthongs ei and ie. Similarly, the Prov. verb is not esfreidar, but esfredar, with simple e; a fact equally excluding frei from frigidum, which, like F. froid, has the diphthong in compounds whether accented or unaccented. The only primitive, M. Paris points out, which satisfies these conditions, is the Late Lat. exfridare, from Teutonic frīdu, peace; so that the original meaning of the O. F. word is "to put out of peace," "disturb," "disquiet." This etymology explains the frequent use of the O. F. participle esfrei with the meaning "disturbed in mind," "angry," and the still later use of effrayé de peur to express what effrayé now does alone. The primary meaning is better kept in the O. F. subst. esfrei, which often means "tumult," "noise;" but for its literal preservation we must look to the Mod. Eng. subst. affray (fray), which means now, as it did when it was formed, "a breach of the peace." One little point deserves mention. Frīdu, in the Old Teutonic technical sense, like "the king's peace" in considerably later days, was applied specially to highways and other public places; and to this day affray, as a law term, is used only of private fighting in a public place, not of a disturbance inside a house.—H. Nicol. I entirely subscribe to this derivation of affray from Low Lat.

exfridare, spelt exfrediare in the Laws of Hen. I. c. 81. § 4. The Teut. frīdu is represented by A. S. frīð, Icel. frīðr, G. friede, &c. In Anglo-French we find the sb. affray, Liber Albus, p. 312; affrei, Stat. of the Realm, i. 185, an. 1332; and note esp. affrai de la pees, Stat. Realm, i. 258, an. 1328. See Frith.

AFFREIGHTMENT, the act of hiring a ship for the transportation of goods. (F., — L. and G.) Still in use. Blount gives affretamentum, with a reference to Pat. 11 Hen. IV. par. 1. m. 12, which represents an O. F. affrètement, the same word as mod. F. affrètement, the hiring of a ship (Littre). Formed with suffix -ment from O. F. affreter (mod. F. affréter), to hire a ship (Littre). — Lat. af-, for ad, prefix; and F. fret, 'the freight or freight of a ship, also the hire that's paid for a ship, or for the freight thereof;' Cotgrave. This fret is of G. origin; see further under Fraught.

AFFRONT. It has been suggested to me that the O. F. afronter is more likely to be from the very common Lat. phrase a fronte, in front, to one's face, than from ad frontem, which is comparatively rare.

AFTERMATH, a second crop of mown grass. (E.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xvii. c. 8. Sommer gives an A. S. form mæð, but it is unauthorized. Here math = a mowing; allied to Mow, and to Mead (2), q. v. Cf. G. mahd, a mowing, nachmahd, aftermath.

AGISTMENT, the pasturage of cattle by agreement. (F., — L.) See Halliwell; Blount gives a reference for the word, anno 6 Hen. VI. cap. 5, and instances the verb to agist and the sbs. agistor, agistage. All the terms are Law French. The F. verb agister occurs in the Year-Books of Edw. I., vol. iii. 231; agistement in the same, iii. 23; and agistours, pl. in the Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 161, an. 1311. The sbs. are from the vb. agister, lit. to assign a resting-place or lodging. — F. a (Lat. ad), to; and O. F. giste, 'a bed, couch, lodging, place to lie on or to rest in,' Cotgrave. This O. F. giste = mod. E. gist; see Gist.

AGNAIL. I now suspect that this article is incorrect, and that the F. agnaille has had little to do with the matter except in extending the meaning to a corn on the foot, &c. See Catholicum Anglicum, p. 4, note 4. It is better to consider the word, as commonly used, as E., since there is authority for A. S. agnægl. In Gascoigne, ed. Hazlitt, ii. 313, we are told that hartshorn will 'skinne a kybed [chilblained] heel, or fret an agnayle off,' where the word is absurdly misprinted as anguayle. — A. S. agnægl, A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 81, § 34. The form agnail corresponds with O. Fries. ogneil, variant of ongneil, a misshapen nail due to an injury. The prefix ang- is from A. S. ange, in the orig. sense of 'compressed,' whence the compounds angniss, sorrow, anguish, &c.; see Anger. The A. S. nægl = mod. E. nail. It remains true that hang-nail is a corrupted form. Thus agnail is an A. S. word, prob. modified by confusion with French.

AGOG. This article is entirely wrong; I was misled by Vigfusson's translation of Icel. gægjask as 'to be all agog.' We may first note an excellent example of on gog in Gascoigne's Poems, ed. Hazlitt, ii. 288, viz. 'Or, at the least, yt settis the harte on gogg,' i. e. astir; The Griefe of Joye, thyrd Songe, st. 21. As an additional example, take the following: 'Being set agog to thinke all the world otemele;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Phocion, § 11. It greatly resembles W. gog, activity; cf. W. gogi, to agitate. Perhaps a-gog = on gog, in agitation, in a state of activity. But gog does not seem to be a genuine Celtic word; so that this solution also fails. We must, in any case, set aside Icel. gægjask and gægjur, G. gucken, and probably also the F. à gogo.

AGRIMONY, a plant. (F., — L., — Gk.) M. E. agreinoine, egreinoine, Chaucer, C. T. 16268. — O. F. agrimoine, agreinoine, 'agrimony, or egrimony;' Cot. — Low L. agrimonia, corruption of L. argemonia, a plant, Pliny, xxv. 9 (White). We also find L. argemone, Pliny, xxvi. 9, answering to a Gk. ἀργεμώνη. So called, in all probability, from being supposed to cure white spots in the eye. — L. argema, a small ulcer in the eye, Pliny, xxv. 13, xxviii. 11 (White). — Gk. ἀργεμῶν, ἀργεμῶς, a small white speck or ulcer on the eye (Liddell and Scott). — Gk. ἀργός, white, shining. — ✓ ARG, to shine. See Argent.

AIR (2), an affected manner. (F.) In the phrase 'to give oneself airs,' &c. In Shak. Wint. Tale, v. 1. 128. — F. aire, mien. The same as Ital. aria, mien. See Debonair; and see note on Mal-aria (below).

AISLE. It appears, from the quotations made for the Phil. Soc. Dict., that the s in the E. aisle was suggested by the s in E. isle, and was introduced, curiously enough, independently of the s in the F. spelling aisle. Both E. and F. spellings are various and complicated. See Phil. Soc. Proceedings, June 18, 1880.

AIT. Add: M. E. ait, spelt ait, Layamon, 23873; whence eitlond, an island, Layamon, 1117.

AITCH-BONE, the rump-bone. (Hybrid; F., — L. and E.) Miss Baker, in her Northamp. Gloss., gives 'aitch-bone, the extreme end of a rump of beef, cut obliquely.' It also appears as edge-bone (Webster), ice-bone (Forby), nache-bone (Carr's Craven Glossary). All the forms are corruptions of nache-bone, i.e. rump-bone. The nache is 'the point of the rump;' Old Country Words, E. D. S., p. 97. We find nache also in Fitzherbert's Husbandry (Glossary); and nach in G. Markham's Husbandry (Of Oxen). The earliest example I have found is hach-boon, Book of St. Albans, leaf f 3, back; A. D. 1486. — O. F. nache, sing. of naches, the buttocks (Roquefort). — Low Lat. naticas, acc. of naticae, buttocks; not in Ducange, but cited by Roquefort. Dimin. of L. nates, pl. of natis, the rump. Allied to Gk. vārov, the back; cf. Skt. nati, a bowing down, from nam, to bow down, sink, bend.

¶ Dr. Murray draws my attention to the fact that Mr. Nicol obtained this etymology (independently) in 1878; see Minutes of Meetings of Phil. Soc. Feb. 1, 1878.

AJAB. It is worth adding that the A. S. cyrrre (better cerre), dat. of cerr, a turn, usually appears in adverbial phrases. Thus æt sumum cyrrre, at some time, Luke xxii. 32; æt dōrum cerre, at another time, Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, cap. xxxv. § 2; æt dnum cierre, at the same time, Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, cap. lxi., ed. Sweet, p. 455, last line.

AKIMBO. Possibly (E. and Scand.), the prefix a- being the common E. prefix marked A- (2). Mr. E. Magnusson has kindly given me a probable solution of the word. Starting from the M. E. phrase in kennebowe, which may be considered to represent in kenbowe, he compares this with Icel. keng-boginn, crooked, bent into a crook, compounded of Icel. kengr, a crook, a staple, bend, bight, and boginn, pp. of the lost strong verb bjúga, to bow, just as A. S. bogen is the pp. of búgan; see Bow (1). The Icel. kengr is allied to Swed. kink, a twist in a rope, mod. E. kink; see Kink. Note the phrase beygði kenginn, i. e. he bent the staple, Edda, ii. 285. Cf. Norweg. kink, a bend, kjeng, a staple, kinkutt, crooked, bowed. β. Thus kimbo (for kin-bo, M. E. kenbowe) is, in fact, kink-bowed, bent into a staple-like form. Hence Dryden well uses it to express the curved handles of a cup, translating the Lat. ansa, Virgil, Ecl. iii. 45. To place the arms akimbo is to place them with the back of the knuckles against the side, so that the elbows stick out like the handle of a jug. I may here add that Richardson actually uses kembo as a verb. 'Oons, madam, said he, and he kemboed his arms, and strutted up to me...' 'Kemboed arms! my lord, are you not sorry for such an air?' Sir C. Grandison, ed. 1812, iv. 288, 290 (Davies). γ. Yet it must be confessed that even this ingenious solution is not altogether satisfactory; it hardly explains how it came to be a part of the M. E. phrase. Wedgwood points out that Cotgrave, s.v. quarrer [not quarrir] has 'to carry his armes akembo,' and, s.v. anse, has les bras courbez en anse, with armes akembo. He seems to take akembo to be the older form, but we have no proof of this, as the M. E. spelling is in kennebowe. I fear the word remains unsolved, for lack of sufficient data.

ALABASTER. Not (L., — Gk.), but (F., — L., — Gk.). From O. F. alabastre, for which see Littré, s.v. albâtre.

ALBATROSS. (Port., — Span., — Arab., — Gk.) F. albatros, formerly alcatros; but this F. form was prob. borrowed from English. — Port. alcatraz, a cormorant, albatross; Span. alcatraz, a pelican. — Port. alcatrúz, Span. areaduz, a bucket. — O. Span. alcaduz, a bucket (Minshen). — Arab. al-qádús, lit. the bucket. — Arab. al, the; Gk. kádós, a water-vessel. Similarly the Arab. sagqá, a water-carrier, means a pelican, because it carries water in its pouch. See Devic, Suppl. to Littré. Note also that Drayton uses the Port. form: 'Most like to that sharp-sighted alcatraz;' The Owl. In An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 94 (ab. 1565) it is said that certain sea-birds were "by the Portuguese called Alcatrarses."

ALBUM. The mod. E. use of the word, in the sense of a white book, is of course a modification. The Lat. album, like Gk. λευκωμα, meant a tablet covered with gypsum for writing public notices on.

ALCAYDE, a judge. See Cadi below.

ALCOHOL. 'Applied to the black sulphid of antimony, which is used as a collyrium. Cf. Ezek. xxiii. 40 in Heb. and LXX. The idea of fineness and tenuity probably caused this word to be applied also to the rectified spirit. "They put betwene the eye-lids and the eye a certaine blacke powder . . . made of a minerall brought from the kingdom of Fez, and called Alcohole;" Sandys' Travels, 1632, p. 67.' (T. L. O. Davies, Supplementary Glossary.)

ALEMBIC. In Rich. Dict. p. 175, is a note that Arab. anbik is pronounced ambik, which accounts for the m in Spanish, &c.

ALGUM. Heb. 'algrúmmim, 'almuggim. The latter is supposed to be the better form; Gesenius doubts the identification with Skt. valguika.

ALLAY. Instead of calling this (F., — L.), it is much better to mark it as (E.). The M. E. alaien (also aleggen) is precisely the A. S. aleegan, to lay down, hence to put down. — A. S. á- (prefix); leegan, to lay; see Lay (1). Note particularly: 'Thy pryde we wolle alaye,' i. e. put down, Arthur, ed. Furnivall (E.E.T.S.), p. 219. The confusion with the O. F. derivative of L. alleuiare is duly noted by Mätzner, who gives several examples. My account at p. 16 is confused and misleading.

ALLELUIA. Read 'the Piel modification,' not 'the Piel voice'; see Kalisch, Heb. Gr. sect. 37. For 'Jehováah, God,' read 'jahveh [or yahveh], Jehovah.' — A. L. M.

ALLIGATOR. Called 'a monstrous legarto or crocodile' by J. Horthorn in 1591; Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 314.

ALLODIAL. Dele from beginning of § γ to the end of the article. The derivation quoted from Vigfusson's Icel. Dict. cannot well be accepted. The forms alodis, alodis occur in the Lex Salica, ed. Hessels and Kern; on which Hessels remarks, 'on this word cf. Monumenta Germaniae historica, Legg. III. p. 104, 282, 312; Diez, Wörterbuch, s.v. alodio.' According to Diez, it is from O. H. G. alód, full ownership.

ALLOT. This hybrid compound was due to Anglo-French, which formed a verb from the E. word lot. The pp. alote, allotted, occurs in the Year-Books of Edw. I., iii. 337. Godefroy also cites Anglo-F. allotement, Littleton's Tenures, ed. 1577, fol. 54, back.

ALLOY. to combine metals, to mix gold and silver with metals of less value. (F., — L.) The etymology given at p. 17 is the popular one, and is adopted by Diez, Scheler, and Littré, though the last of these expresses doubt. But it is certainly wrong, and due to a misunderstanding of early date, since even Cotgrave gives alloy with one l, as if it were compounded of a and loy, law. The truth is that the sb. is a derivative of the verb. We already find the pp. alayed in P. Plowman, B. xv. 346. This is from an Anglo-F. *alayer, equivalent to O. F. aleier, aloier, old spelling of F. allier; see allier in Littré; and cf. s'aleier in Chanson de Roland, l. 990. Cotgrave gives alier, allier, 'to stiffen, or imbaise gold, &c., by mingling it with other metals.' — Lat. alligare, to bind fast. — Lat. al-, for ad, to; ligare, to bind. Thus alloy is a doublet of Ally, q.v. β. The etymology is proved by Ital. legare, 'to solder or combine metals,' Florio; whence the sb. lega, 'alloy,' id.; for lega can only be derived from legare, and could not have come from Lat. acc. legem (which gave Ital. legge). Cf. also Port. ligar, 'to alloy metals;' whence liga, sb., 'alloying of metals;' Vieyra. Even Spanish has ligar, to alloy, liga, alloy, as well as the comp. alear, to alloy. The derivation from ligare thus becomes irrefutable. The Anglo-F. aloy, sb., occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 140, an. 1300. Godefroy, s.v. aloier, cites several examples of the spelling allayer.

ALLURE. The pp. alured occurs in 1538; see Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 83. The Anglo-F. alurer, to allure, occurs in Wright's Voc. i. 151. Other similar derivatives of lure occur in the forms enlured, i. e. lured as a hawk, in the Book of St. Albans (1486), leaf d 3, back; and ilurid, with the same sense, id. leaf d 4.

ALMANAC. I unfortunately took the Gk. form ἀλμαναχά from Brachet, who is mistaken. The Gk. word is ἀλμανιχακά, neut. pl.; the phrase ἐν τοῖς ἀλμανιχακαῖς occurs in Eusebius, as cited. But it is hardly possible to derive almanac from this Gk. form. The etymology is almost hopeless; but it may perhaps be traced, through F. almanac, Span. almanac (or almanaque) to Arab. al, the, and manakh, a calendar, used in the Toledo tables compiled in the 13th century; see Tyrwhitt's note to Chaucer, C. T. 11585. This manakh is not a true Arabic word, but prob. of Gk. origin; perhaps from Gk. μήν, a month. It may be noted that the Lat. manacus, in Forcellini, is a false form, due to a misreading. The right reading is manaeus = Gk. μηναιός, the zodiac. It occurs in Vitruvius, de Archit. ix. 8, the other readings being maneus, manaeus. See the ed. by Rose and Müller-Strübing, Lipsiae, 1867.

ALMOND. Not (F., — Gk.), but (F., — L., — Gk.); as the context shews. Dr. Murray explains the spelling with al by supposing that, in the Span. almendra, the al was put for a by confusion with the Arabic article al. In this case, there must have been an O. F. form almande as well as amande, though it is not given in Littré or Burguy. We find, however, the Anglo-F. pl. alemaundes in the Liber Albus, p. 224; almande in Roquefort, and the very form almande in Godefroy, but given s.v. almande. The Gk. ἀμυγδάλη is said to be of Phrygian origin (Wharton, Etyma Græca).

ALOE. Cf. lignum aloes in Mandeville, Trav. pp. 218, 241; 'galle and aloes,' Test. of Love, in Chaucer's Works, 1561, fol. 286, col. 2. The word agallochum is Aryan, not Semitic; Gesenius says that the Heb. 'ahálim is not a Semitic word, but of Indian origin. Cf. Skt. aguru, aloe-wood, appearing in various Ind. dialects as aghi, agaru, aguru; see Wilson's Skt. Dict.

ALONG. The note, in the former edition, that E. along is different from Icel. endilangr is wrong. Dr. Murray remarks that the A. S. andlang was at first an adjective, and afterwards a preposition, and that, as an adj., it is precisely the Icel. endilangr or endlangr, i. e. all along, throughout the length. See A. S. andlang in Bosworth's

A.S. Dict. (new edition). The M. E. endelong was a modification of A.S. andlang, due to confusion with ende (end), and loss of the sense of the prefix. Yet it is not altogether wrong, for the connection between end and the prefix and- is real: see End. Along is, in fact, anti-long or end-long (taking end in the sense of parallel edge), side by side.

ALONG (2), in the phr. along of or along on. (E.) This is not quite the same word as along (1), but differs in the prefix. We find 'It's all 'long on you,' Prol. to the Return to Parnassus (1606). Chaucer has: 'whereon it was along;' C. T. 16398; and again: 'Som seide it was long on the fyr-makings,' id. 16390. Gower has: 'How al is on myself along;' C. A. ii. 22 (bk. iv). Here along is a corruption of ilong, and long is ilong without the initial i. This prefix i- is the usual M. E. form of the A. S. prefix ge-, and along answers, accordingly, to A. S. gelang, as pointed out by Todd in his ed. of Johnson's Dict. Moreover, the very form ilong (used with on) occurs in Layamon, 15502. — A. S. gelang, as in on ðam gelang, along of that, because of that, Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, bk. iv. c. 10, § 9. — A. S. ge-, prefix; and lang, long. ¶ Precisely the same corruption of the prefix occurs in Aware, q. v.

ALPHABET. Rather (Gk., — Phœnician) than (Gk., — Heb.). The Gk. and Heb. letters were from a common (Phœnician) source. — A. L. M.

ALREADY. Probably (E.), not (Scand.). See Ready.

ALTAR. The word occurs, in the dat. case altare, in the A. S. Gospels, Matt. v. 24; but only in one MS., all the rest (including MS. B., which Kemble has not noted) have wefede, wesofede, wigbed, &c. I therefore adhere to my opinion, that the M. E. altar was borrowed from O. French, and that the spelling altar (with a few exceptions) is comparatively late. Of course the opposite view, that the word was borrowed (like O. Sax. altari) directly from Latin, is perfectly tenable. Fortunately, it does not much matter.

ALTERCATION. The O. F. altercation is quite right; I now observe that Littré gives an example of it as occurring in the 13th century. Authority for the F. form occurs also in the Anglo-French altercacioun, in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 332.

ALTOGETHER. M. E. altogedere, Ancren Riwe, p. 320, l. 25.

ALTRUISM, regard for others. (Ital., — L.; with Gk. suffix.) I have frequently been asked for the etymology of this queerly-coined word, the sense of which is obvious to the student of Italian, and (apparently) to no one else. It is coined (with the Greek suffix -ism) from Ital. altrui, another, others. — Ital. altro, nom. sing. masc.; altra, nom. sing. fem.; altri, nom. pl.; which, when preceded by any preposition, is changed into altrui for both genders and numbers (Meadows). — L. alterum, acc. of alter, another. See Alter.

AMALGAM. Not (F., — Gk.), but (F., — L., — Gk.). But the derivation from μάλαγμα, given by Mahn, Littré, Scheler, and Diez, is not very satisfactory. Devic (Supp. to Littré) traces the Low Lat. amalgama back to the 13th century, and says that it occurs in Albertus Magnus and Arnoldus de Villa Nova. He thinks it may be Arabic, but fails to prove it so.

AMAZON. The usual derivation of Gk. Ἀμαζών, which I give, is probably fabulous, and the story an invention intended to satisfy a popular craving for an etymology.

AMBASSADOR, l. 10. The form ambactia is not the form in the MSS. of the Salic Law, but the forms ambascia, ambasia, ambassia, ambaxia, all occur there, and the word there signifies a charge, office, or employment; see Lex Salica, ed. Hessels and Kern, 1880. *Ambactia is the theoretical form whence all the others proceed.

AMBER. Perhaps (F., — Span., — Arabic) instead of from the Arabic directly. We find M. E. aumbr, Prompt. Parv. — F. ambre; Cot. — Span. ambar. — Arab. 'ambar, ambergris, a rich perfume and cordial;' Rich. Dict. p. 1031.

AMBRY. Add: M. E. awmery, awmebry, Prompt. Parv. p. 18; which assists the etymology. O. F. almaire, Roman de Rou, 4565.

AMEN. Heb. 'āmén; the initial 'ālef should be represented by the smooth breathing. The primary meaning of the 'āman is 'to be firm, to be fixed;' the transitive meaning is secondary. — A. L. M.

AMERCEMENT. Wedgwood's strictures on this article should be read, though they seem to me to be contradictory. He considers that the F. verb amercier was formed from the phrase à merci, because the Lat. phrase for to be liable to punishment at the discretion of the court was poni in misericordia. At the same time, he admits that merci and misericordia have no etymological connection, and censures me for saying that any one has ever implied that they have. Yet Blount, in his Nomo-Lexicon, says 'merci, i. misericordia,' and to show that he actually supposes these words to be connected, refers us to misericordia, and then to moderata misericordia, translating the latter by a moderate amercement, emphasised by italics. There is nowhere any hint in Blount, that merci and misericordia are different words. Again, in Wedgwood's Dict., s. v. amercement, I find the word misericordia mentioned four times, and merces wholly ignored, though the etymology of mercy (to which there is no cross-reference) is rightly given. Thirdly, Roquefort, who was no etymologist, expressly derives mercy from misericordia; so do Minsheu and Johnson! Under the circumstances, it is worth while to repeat that no phrase involving misericordia is of any use in explaining amercement, as the words, admittedly, are unconnected.

β. Much more to the point is the passage which Wedgwood cites, from Ducange, as occurring in Hincmar (9th cent.): 'Cum per wadia emendaverit quod misfactum patebat, mandaveritque mihi se velle ad meam mercedem venire, et sustinere qualem illi commendassem harmiscarum,' i.e. that he would come to put himself at my mercy, and would submit to whatever amercement I should impose upon him. This suggests the derivation of O. F. amercier from the phrase ad mercedem, and such may be the right explanation. Yet it merely brings us back to the word merces, already correctly assigned by me as the Lat. word upon which amercement is founded. On the other hand, O. F. has also the simple verb mercier, from which, according to Burguy, both O. F. amercier and mod. F. remercier were formed; so that the idea of this derivation did not at all originate with me, as supposed. Roquefort gives to the simple verb mercier both senses, (1) to thank, (2) to pay; cf. 'Deus le vus merciet,' may God repay you; Chanson de Roland, 519. Mercedem soluere, to make payment, occurs in Juvenal, vii. 157; so that the sense of 'pay' for the O. F. mercier causes no difficulty. Hence O. F. amercier, to fix a payment, to impose a fine, could quite easily have been formed, without the phrase ad mercedem; but if the reader likes to consider this phrase as the true origin, he has only to amend my article accordingly.

AMITY. Spelt amye in Skelton, Why Come ye Nat to Courte, l. 371.

AMMONIA. The Egyptian origin is certain. Peyron gives the Coptic amoun, the name of a great tower in Egypt; the name of a mountain; also, glory, height, high. And see Smith's Classical Dictionary. 'In the writings of Synesius, bp. of Pentapolis, we have an account of the preparation of the sal ammoniacus by the priests of Jupiter Ammon, and its transmission [from the Libyan desert] to Egypt in baskets made of the leaves of palms;' I. Taylor, Words and Places. ¶ Otherwise, the name 'Ἀμμών is from Egypt. Amon (in Heb. 'Amón, Jer. 46, 25), the supreme deity of the Egyptians, worshipped at Thebes as Amen-Ra, or Amen the sun. His name means 'the hidden.' See Ebers, in Gesenius, Heb. Dict., 8th ed. p. 54; Smith, Dict. of the Bible. — A. L. M.

AMMUNITION. Probably (F., — L.), not (L.) The Low L. admunio, not in common use, appears to have nothing to do with it. The E. ammunition appears to be an E. spelling of the old popular F. amunition, given by Littré as an archaic form of F. munition, and possibly due to misunderstanding la munition as l'ammunition. See therefore Munition.

AMULET, l. 7. In the later edition of Richardson, the word occurs on p. 580. The Arabic origin of this word is disputed.

ANA, ANNA, the sixteenth part of a rupee. (Hindustani.) Hind. ána (written aná in Skt.), the sixteenth of a rupee, commonly, but incorrectly, written anna. Also used as a measure, to express a sixteenth part of a thing; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 24.

ANAGRAM. Not (F., — Gk.), but (F., — L., — Gk.). The context so explains it.

ANALOGY, ANATOMY. Correct as in Anagram (above).

ANCHORITE. Not (F., — Gk.), but (F., — Low Lat., — Gk.). See the context.

ANDIRON. At p. 197 of Wright's Vocab. we find Hec andena, Anglice awndyren; where awndyren is a later form than aundyre. See also Catholicon Anglicum, p. 16, note 1.

ANILINE, a substance which furnishes a number of dyes. (F., — Span., — Arab., — Pers.) Modern. Formed with suffix -ine (F. -ine, Lat. -inus) from anil, a shrub from which the W. Indian indigo is made. 'Anil... is a kind of thing to dye blue withal;' Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, vi. 18 (ab. 1586). — F. anil, anil. — Span. añil, 'azure, skie colour;' Minsheu, p. 25, l. 12. — Arab. an-níl, put for al níl, where al is the def. art., and níl is borrowed from Pers. níl, the indigo-plant, lit. blue; cf. Skt. nílá, the indigo-plant. See Lilac, Nylghau.

ANNUITY. It occurs as early as A. D. 1408, in the Will of Hen. IV; Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 204. The Anglo-F. annuite occurs in the year-books of Edw. I., iii. 179.

ANT. 'Chameleon, amete;' Wright's Voc. ii. 15 (11th cent.). But it is spelt amette in the place to which I refer. The M. E. form amte occurs in Wyclif, Prov. vi. 6.

ANTARCTIC. M. E. antartik, Mandeville's Trav. p. 180; Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, ii. 25. 7.

ANTELOPE. Spelt antelope in 1506, Reliquiæ Antiquæ, ii. 116; antlop in 1486, Book of St. Albans, pt. ii. fol. c 8, back; antelop, A.D. 1432, in Liber Albus, iii. 459. The E. spelling is probably due to O. French, for Godefroy gives the O. F. antelop as well as a commoner form antelu. So also Palsgrave gives O. F. antelop as the F. for 'antelope, a beast.'

ANTICHRIST. It occurs as M. E. Antecrist, Mandeville's Travels, ch. xxvi.; see Spec. of English, ed. Morris and Skeat, p. 173, l. 83.

ANTLER. (F., -L.) Spelt awntelere in the Book of St. Albans, leaf e 1, back; awntelere, Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 151. The etymology given is wrong, and the supposition that t stands for d is also wrong. On the contrary, the forms andouiller and endouiller in Cotgrave are corruptions, respectively, of O. F. antoillier, entoillier, cited by Littre. Of these, the former answers to a Low Lat. *antocularium (Scheler), lit. that which is in front of the eye. If this be so, the etymology is from Lat. ante oculum, before the eye. See Ante- and Ocular. Cf. F. oeiller, adj., belonging to the eye (Cotgrave), from Lat. ocularis.

ANVIL. 'Incus, anfilte,' Wright's Voc. i. 34, col. 2 (this is the same as the ref. to Ælf. Glos. ed. Sommer, p. 65). Also 'Cudo, anfilte,' id. i. 286, col. 2. 'Incudā [sic], onfilte,' Wright's Voc. ii. 111 (8th cent.). Quite distinct from Du. aanbeeld; and the curious spelling onfilte, found so early as in the 8th century, seems to me entirely to preclude the possibility of considering it as a formation from A. S. fealdan, to fold, in order to make it answer to O. H. G. aneualz, an anvil (from O. H. G. valdan, to fold). We also find the curious and obscure gloss (likewise of the 8th century): 'Cudo, i. percutio, cedo, vel onfilte,' Wright's Voc. ii. 137, col. 1. The spelling anfeld occurs as late as 1502, in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 245. β. There are some noteworthy remarks on this word in Koolman's E. Fries. Dict. s. v. ambolt and s. v. filte, where he suggests that the O. H. G. aneualz cannot be from O. H. G. valdan, to fold (indeed, the z forbids it), but is rather connected with G. falzen, to groove, join (fit together). The A. S. onfilte points back to the same base filte or falt-, and then it becomes a question whether we may connect this with G. filz, E. felt, and whether felt itself may be from a root signifying 'to beat together.' The anvil would then be that whereon iron is felted, i.e. welded together. The spelling anvelde occurs as late as in Palsgrave.

APOCALYPSE, APOCOPE. Not (Gk.), but (L., -Gk.).

APPAL. Not (Hybrid), but (F., -L.). This article is, I regret to say, quite wrong, as also that on Pall. Appal and pall are both from F. pâle (O. F. palle, pasle), pale, Lat. pallidus, and are allied to pale and pallid. The O. F. appalir, apalir is the immediate source of appall, and is derived from O. F. a (Lat. ad), prefix, and O. F. pasle, pale. See Pale (2). β. Cotgrave has appalir, 'to grow or make pale' [misprinted appalir in ed. 1660]; appali, 'growne or made pale.' Palsgrave has 'I appale ones colour, Je appalis; I appalle, as drinke dothe or wyne, whan it leseth his colour or ale whan it hath stande longe, Je appalys; and again, 'I palle, as drinke or bloode dothe by longe standyng in a thyng, Je appalys;' and 'I palle, I fade of freshenesse in colour or beauty, Je flaitiris.' Cotgrave also shews (as above), that the verb appalir was transitive as well as neuter. Mätzner rightly gives the derivation from O. F. appalir, and cites another quotation from Chaucer, C. T. 10679 (Sq. Ta. F. 365), where appalled may simply be explained as 'pale' or 'faded in look,' instead of 'languid,' as given in my glossary when writing under a false impression. Wedgwood truly says that I followed his bad example in rejecting the obvious derivation from O. F. appalir; I now follow his good example in admitting it.

APPLE, 1. 2. Cf. 'Pruelle, the ball, or apple, of the eie;' Cot. See Catholicon Anglicum, ed. Herrtage, p. 11, note 5.

ARABESQUE. The name of the country of Arabia is written 'arab in Rich. Dict. p. 1000.

ARBOUR. The common use of this word in provincial English, as applied to a harbour or rustic shelter clearly points to the derivation from harbour, to which I adhere. Dr. Stratmann puts it as equivalent to 'M. E. herber, a garden of herbs, &c.; and there is no doubt that, in the passage which he cites, arber = M. E. herber. But this only proves a confusion between M. E. herber, of F. origin, and M. E. herberze, a harbour; a confusion which I have already pointed out. The passage cited by Stratmann is curious and worthy of notice. It runs thus: 'In the garden, as I wene, Was an arber fair and grene, And in the arber was a tre'; Squire of Low Degree, l. 28 (Ritson). As to the prov. E. arbour, a shelter, a sort of small hut without a door, a summer-house, I cannot be mistaken, having frequently heard it in Shropshire (where initial h does not exist), and, I believe, in Norfolk (where initial h is often misused). I look upon Florio's explanation of arborata by 'an arbor or bower of boughs or trees' as suggested by popular etymology. The M. E. arborze in Morte Arthure, 3244, and Mandeville, p. 256, means 'a collection of trees,' not an arbour.

ARCH (1). Add: Hence the Court of Arches, 'originally held in the arches of Bow Church—St. Mary de Arcubus—the crypt of which was used by Wren to support the present superstructure'; I. Taylor, Words and Places. And see Todd's Johnson.

ARCH (2). Stratmann suggests that arch is nothing but the prefix arch- (as in arch-bishop, arch-fiend, arch-traitor), used alone. No doubt this explains the form of the word correctly, but I cannot understand how it acquired its peculiar sense, unless it were partly confused with M. E. argh, as I suggest, though this M. E. form would certainly have become arrow, by rule. This is one of the points which the Philological Society's Dictionary will (I suppose) entirely clear up. See argh in Catholicon Anglicum, p. 12. Jamieson gives an example, from Douglas, of arch, timid, with guttural ch; and the same spelling is in the Ancræn Riwe, p. 202, note a. It is not unlikely that the ch in this word was mistaken for ch as we now have it.

ARCHIMANDRITE. (L., -Gk.) 'Archimandrite, an abbot, prior, or chief of an hermitage'; Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. — Late L. archimandrita, a chief or principal of monks, an abbot; Sidonius Apollinaris, Ep. 8. 14 (White). — Late Gk. ἀρχιμανδρίτης, the same. — Gk. ἀρχι-, chief (see Archi-); μάνδρα, an enclosed space, fold, (in late Gk.) a monastery; see Madrigal.

ARCHITECT. Also in Shak., Titus Andron. v. 3. 122.

ARECA. a genus of palms, of which one species produces the areca-nut or betel-nut (Canarese). From the Karnāta (Canarese) adike, adike, betel or areca-nut; Wilson, Indian Terms, p. 7. The cerebral d is mistaken for r. 'Areca is corrupted from the Canarese adike. In Tamil, which has borrowed it, veitil adeka is 'betel and areca,' the leaf and the nut of one and the same tree.' (F. Hall.)

ARENA. The etymology of Lat. arena is often given from arere, to dry. This is certainly wrong, not only because arere has long a, but because the better form of the sb. is harena, whilst the Sabine form appears as fasena. The lit. sense is 'bright' or 'shining,' from √BHAS, to shine, whence also Lat. festus, joyful. From the same root is the E. bare, q. v. As to h for f, see Herb; for the adj. suffix -ena, cf. eg-enus. See Lewis and Short, Lat. Dict.; Corssen, Aussprache, 2nd ed. i. 102.

ARROINT THEE. Add, at the end: the Icel. ryma is from Icel. rim, room (by vowel-change of ú to y); see Room.

ARRANT. Not (E.), but (F., -L.). Whether the A. S. earg, M. E. arwe, cowardly, had any influence upon this word, I will not now undertake to say. But further examination shews that arrant really stands for errant. Early examples are 'theef erraunt, arrant thief, Chaucer, C. T. 17173; 'erraunt usurer'; P. Plowman, C. vii. 307; 'errant traytours,' Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 105 (A.D. 1539); 'errant theues' and 'erraunt theefe' in Lever's Sermons (1550), ed. Arber, p. 66; 'errant whore,' Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, xi. 57. In Holinshed's (really Stanihurst's) Desc. of Ireland, repr. 1808, p. 68, we find: '[they] gad and range from house to house like arrant knights of the round table.' Godefroy notes the form arrant as equivalent to errant. Cf. parson for person, &c. See Errant.

ARRAS. We find 'draps d'Arras' mentioned in the Will of John of Gaunt (1397); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 156. So also 'peces of arras' in 1447; id. p. 283.

ARSON. Anglo-French arsum, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 375; Stat. of Realm. i. 96, an. 1285.

ASAFOETIDA. Spelt azafedida, Arnold's Chron. (ab. 1502), ed. 1811, p. 234.

ASKANCE. obliquely. (Ital., -L.) Only the first five lines of this article can stand. The rest is wholly wrong. There is no O. F. a scanche. I unfortunately copied this, without verification, from Wedgwood's second edition (it is corrected in the third), not having access to Palsgrave at the moment, and forgetting to revise the statement. Palsgrave really has: 'A scanche, de trauers, en lorgnant;' but a scanche is here the English word, not the French. It is the earliest spelling of E. askance which I have as yet found. Here a is the usual E. a-, prefix, in the sense of 'on' or 'in'; see A- (2); and skance I take to be borrowed from Ital. scanso, verbal sb. of the verb scansare, explained by Florio to mean 'to cancell, to blur, or blot forth, to go a slope or a sconce, or a skew, to go sidelin, to stagger or go reeling, to auoide or shun a blow.'

β. The Ital. scansare is compounded of s-, prefix (= L. ex, out, out of the way), and cansare, 'to go aslope, to give place,' Florio. This Ital. verb is probably derived from L. campare, to turn or go round a place (hence, to bend aside); see White. Allied to Gk. κάμπτειν, to bend, W. cam, crooked.

ASSAGAI, ASSEGAI. (Port., -Moorish.) Spelt azagay in Sir T. Herbert, Travels (1665), p. 23. A word (like fetish) introduced into Africa by the Portuguese. = Port. azagaia, a dart, javelin. See Lancegay.

* ASSART, the offence of grubbing up trees, and so destroying the coverts of a forest. (F., —L.). See Blount, Nomo-Lexicon; Manwood, Forest Laws, &c. The word is due to F. essarter, 'to make glades in a wood, to grub up, or clear a ground of bushes, shrubs, thorns, &c.:' Cotgrave. —Low Lat. exsartare, to grub up, occurring an. 1233 (Ducange); also spelt exartare. —Lat. ex, out, thoroughly; and Low Lat. sartare, to grub up, occurring an. 1202 (Ducange). Sartare (= *sartare) is the frequentative of Lat. sarrire, sarrire, to weed, grub up weeds (whence also sar-culum, a hoe); see essart in Diez. Cf. Gk. σαλπεύω, to sweep, σάπος, a besom. The Lat. pl. exsarta, weeded lands, occurs in the Liber Custumarum, p. 660.

ASSIZE (i), l. 13. Add: the Low L. assidere also means 'to impose a tax.'

* ASSOIL, to absolve, acquit. (F., —L.) In Spenser, F. Q. i. 10. 52, ii. 5. 19, &c. Lowland Sc. assoiilie, often miswritten assoiilie (with z for s = y). M. E. assollen, P. Plowman, B. prol. 70, 3. 40, &c. We find Anglo-French assoile, pres. sing. subj. Liber Custumarum, 199; but the pp. pl. is spelt assolz, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 275. —O. F. assoldre, assoldre (Burguy); the same as absoldre (Cotgrave). —Lat. absolvere, to absolve. See ABSOLVE, of which assoil is merely a doublet. ¶ I suspect that the form properly belongs to the pres. subj. or imperative, from the use of the phrase 'God assoil you,' and the like.

ASSORT. Not (F., —Ital., —L.), but (F., —L.). Brachet cannot be right about this; for Littré gives an example of F. assortir in the 15th century.

* ATABAL, a kettle-drum. (Span., —Arab.) In Dryden, Don Sebastian, Act 1. sc. 1. —Span. atabal, a kettle-drum. —Arab. a-, for al, the; tabl, a drum; cf. Pers. tambal, a drum. See TABOUR.

* ATAGHAN. See YATAGHAN below.

ATTIRE. I withdraw much of this article (esp. as given in the first edition). Mr. Nicol's comments upon my article are so excellent, that I here print them entire, with the exception of a few prefatory remarks. 'Even the assertions respecting the subst. atir in Mid. E. and O. F. require an important qualification; they should read, "in Mid. E. and O. F. texts, as far as they have been read and glossed, the Mid. E. subst. atir is found earlier than the verb, and an O. F. subst. atir has not been found." The inferences that the Mid. E. subst. existed earlier than the verb, and that the O. F. subst. did not exist at all, are, at least in the present state of our lexicography, especially of O. F., entirely unwarranted. The non-connection, on the other hand, of O. F. atirer, to adorn, with tirer, to draw, though now well known to O. F. scholars, is not recognised in the dictionaries of Diez, Littré, and Scheler, so that in maintaining it Mr. Skeat has independently hit upon the truth. The O. F. words are, indeed, distinct in form as well as in meaning, "to adorn," or rather "to arrange," being really atirier with the diphthong ie in the infinitive, while the Mod. F. atirer, to draw, is O. F. atirer with simple e. In his other propositions, Mr. Skeat has sometimes merely followed his predecessors, but in several cases he is solely responsible. As to all traces of O. F. atirier having utterly and long ago died out in France, not only was the word common in the 14th century, but it is nearly certain (only the i of the Ital. attiraglio raising a slight doubt) that the Mod. F. attirail, "apparatus," "implements," is one of its derivatives, and it is still more certain that in the heraldic term tire, a row (applied to the rows of the fur vair), and in the colloquial expression tout d'une tire, "at one go," "at a stretch," there survives the O. F. substantive from which atirier is derived. For the O. F. verb tirer, to adorn, which Mr. Skeat supposes to be the missing primitive of atirier, is a fiction; the verb atirier, to arrange, is what is termed a parasynthetic compound, that is, formed direct from the prep. a and the subst. tire, row—just as aligner, embarquer, come direct from a ligne, en barque, not from imaginary verbs, ligner, barquer. But even if atirier, with its derivatives, had long been extinct in French, that is no argument against its having been both common and of early introduction; still less does it give reason to believe that it was a purely Anglo-Norman word posterior to the Conquest. As a matter of fact, it must have been a very old word in the Romanic languages; the verb (and doubtless the primitive subst.) existed in Eastern French, the subst. in Italian, and both of them in Provençal, in each case with their special forms, showing that they cannot have been borrowed from Norman French, but must have developed independently from a common primitive, and have gone through a whole series of phonetic changes. Ital. tiera means "an assemblage," but an earlier meaning is preserved in the phrase correre a tiera, "to run in file;" while the Prov. tieira, besides being applied to the person in the senses of "get-up" (if I may use a colloquial expression), "demeanour," is the regular word for "row," "series," and exists at this day, with unchanged meaning, in the form tieiro. The Old

F. subst. tire (which, as already mentioned, survives in Mod. F.) means "file" (of persons), "series," the phrase a tire meaning "in order," "in succession;" the word no doubt, as stated in glossaries, also meant "dress" (as distinguished from mere "clothing") "ornaments," though no example is given. The possible dialectal O. F. forms tiere, tieire, found in Roquefort, also unfortunately want corroboration. The verb—Prov. ateirar, East. F. ateirier, Norm. and Paris. F. atirier—means "to arrange" (literally and figuratively), "adjust," "put in order," "prepare" (a meaning attire also had in English); when reflexive it means "to dress," "get one's self up." An excellent parallel to atirier, "to arrange," from tire, "row," is afforded by arrange itself, which derives from rank, "row," "ring;" while the change from "arranging" to "dressing" is equally well exemplified by dress, originally "to put straight," from Lat. directus. All this shews that the original meaning of the words was not "to adorn," and makes any connection with the Teutonic tīr, "splendor" or "glory," extremely doubtful; and the origin is definitely excluded by the forms of the words, which are incompatible with the i of tīr, and (to a less extent) with its absence of final vowel. The most primitive form is exhibited by the Prov. tieira, whose triphthong ie is reduced in other Prov. dialects to ie or ei; from the same prehistoric F. triphthong ie are contracted the i of ordinary F. tire, atirier, the ei of the stem-syllable of East. F. ateirier. This ie is the ordinary diphthong ie plus an i derived from a following guttural or palatal, the existence of which is further shown by its having converted in French the ordinary e, East. F. ei, from Lat. accented ā of the verb-endings, into the diphthong ie, East. F. ie (seen in the -ier, East. F. -ier, of the infin.). An example of the first phenomenon is Prov. pieitz (peitz), ordinary F. piz (now pis), East. F. peis (Mod. Burgundian pei) from pectus (ie from ē, i from e = k); of the second, O. F. meitié (now moitié), East. F. moitié, from medietatem (where the di formed a palatal consonant), whose tié contrasts with the ordinary ie of clarté (clāritatem), &c. These phonetic conditions are perfectly satisfied by an Early Teutonic feminine teurja, the predecessor of Middle Low Germ. tiere, O. H. G. ziari; the e of Teut. eu is regularly diphthongised to ie, and its u lost before a consonant, while the following j supplies the final i of the triphthong ie in the stem-syllable, and the initial one of the F. ie in the final syllable of atirier. This Early Teut. teurja, O. H. G. ziari, has, however, nothing to do with the Early Teut. (Old E., Old Saxon, and Old Norse) tīr; it has a different root-vowel, a different suffix, and a different gender, as well as a different meaning. The supposed change of meaning from "glory" to "ornament" must therefore be rejected, and with it must go the identification of the Early Mod. E. tire, "head-dress," with the O. E. tīr, "glory;" as abundantly shown by the Promptorium "atyre or tyre of women, redimiculum" (chaplet, fillet), it is merely (as was to be expected) a contraction of attire—a substantive which may well have existed in O. F., though it may equally well be an Engl. formation from the verb, perhaps under the influence of the simple O. F. subst. tire. What has really occurred in German, and perhaps in Romanic (for the secondary meanings of the Rom. words may have developed independently) is the change of meaning from "row," "order," to "ornament," "demeanour;" the Romanic languages, indeed, preserve in Ital. tiera, Prov. tieiro, F. tire, the oldest ascertainable meaning of the word, of which meaning we have, I believe, no example in O. H. German. In the Old Engl. tīer, "row," of whose form and meaning (though Grein has but one example) there can be little doubt, and which is the real cognate of O. H. G. ziari, we find, however, the original meaning; whether this word, as is often said, survives in the Mod. E. tier, "row," is doubtful. [I hold that it does not.—W. W. S.] I will only remark that tier used also to be spelt tire, though, according to Walker, tire meaning "row," and tier, were both pronounced as tear (of the eye); and that the O. F. form tiere, often given as the origin of tier, could hardly have occurred (if at all) in any dialect from which English has borrowed.—H. Nicol.

AUGER. Add:—cf. Swed. nafvare, an auger (Widegren). Here nafvare is for *nafgare, from naf, a nave, and a word allied to Icel. geirr, a spear; see gere in Rietz; and see GARFISH.

AUGUR. We find Anglo-French augurer, an augurer, augur, Langtoft's Chron. i. 242; also augurie, augury, id. i. 10. Godefroy gives O. F. augereres, an augur, and augurie, augury. Hence, though augur itself was perhaps taken immediately from Latin, the derivatives augur-er, augur-y are from the French.

* AUK, a sea-bird. (Scand.) Swed. alka, an auk; Icel. alka, álka. Hence Lat. alea; merely a Latinised form.

AUNT. Anglo-French aunte, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 47, iii. 245.

AUREOLE. This is given, at p. 43, s. v. Aureate, as a derivative of aurum, gold; and, in accordance with this, we find F. auréole, Ital., Span., and Port. aureola, a 'glory' or halo round a saint's head. We actually find Lat. corona aureola in the Vulgate, Exod. xxv. 25, xxx. 3, xxxvii. 27. I am inclined to believe this is really correct; but it has been contended that Lat. aureola was a corruption of areola, dimin. of area. It is further remarkable that F. aureole occurs (as in Cotgrave) as a corruption of laureole, a little laurel, misread as l'aureole. In the Cath. Angl. p. 84, we find: 'a Crowne, laurea, crinale, diodema (sic), corona, auriola;' and, in fact, Lat. laurea and laureola were both used in the sense of laurel crown; being derived from laurus, a laurel. It is most remarkable that the word occurs very early in English, in a passage which decidedly favours the common derivation. 'The meidenes hebben . . a gerlaundesche schinende schenre then the sunne, auriole ihaten o latines ledene,' i.e. the maidens have a sort of garland, shining brighter than the sun, called auriole in the Latin speech; Hali Meidenhad, p. 23. The gratuitous theory that it is a corruption of areola has to contend with the fact that the form with au- occurs in Ital., M.E., Span., and Port. as well as in French. Godefroy gives O.F. aureole, adj., golden. Cf. Oriel, Oriole.

AUTO-DA-FE, a judgment of the Inquisition; also, the execution of such judgment, when the decree or sentence is read out to the victims. (Port., = L.) Lit. 'act of faith.' = Port. auto, action, decree; da, short for de a, of the; fé, faith. [The Span. form is auto de fé, without the Span. art. la, which is the equivalent of the Port. art. a.] = Lat. actum, acc. of actus, act, deed; de, preposition; illa, fem. of ille, he; fidem, acc. of fides, faith. See Act and Faith. Worcester's Dict. has the following note: 'as the details of an auto-da-fe were first made familiar to the English public in an account of the Inquisition at Goa (a Port. colony in the E. Indies), published in the 17th (? 18th) century, the Port. form of the phrase has generally prevailed in E. literature.' Haydn, Dict. of Dates, has: '20 persons perish at an auto-da-fe at Goa, A.D. 1717; Malagrida, a Jesuit, burnt at Lisbon, 1761.'

AVADAVAT, a finch-like E. Indian bird. (Arab. and Pers.) 'A corruption of amaduvad, the name by which the bird is known to Anglo-Indians, and under which it was figured, in 1735, by Albin, Suppl. Nat. Hist. Birds, pl. 77, p. 72. Jerdon (Birds of India, ii. 361) says that Blyth has shewn that this word took its origin from the city of Ahmedabad, whence the bird used to be imported into Europe in numbers.'—A. Newton, in N. and Q. 6 S. ii. 198. Ahmedabad is near the Gulf of Cambay, on the W. coast of Hindostan; and its name is derived from Ahmed, a proper name, and the Pers. ābād, city. Ahmed is from Arab. 'ahmad, very laudable, Rich. Dict. p. 33; from the root hamada, he praised; see Mohammedan.

AVALANCHE. Spelt valanche, Smollett, France and Italy, letter xxxviii (Davies).

AVAST. Dr. Stratmann suggests Ital. abbasta, or Span. abasta. The Ital. abbasta is out of the question; our sea-words are only Scandinavian, Spanish, or Dutch, when not English. The Span. abastar is obsolete; Minshew gives it only in the sense to be satisfied; at this rate, the imperative abasta would mean 'be satisfied,' or 'be content.' This is not at all the sense of avast; it is precisely equivalent to the common every-day English 'hold-fast a bit,' or 'hold hard,' i.e. wait a bit. The word is clearly, to my mind, Dutch, because the Dutch use vast for fast, and say hou for hold. Thus Sewel gives vast houden, to hold fast, and the sb. houvast, a hold-fast, a cramp-iron, a pinch-penny. How easily the Du. hou vast would become avast with English sailors (who would probably not perceive that hold fast would do as well), needs not to be told.

AVERAGE. Wedgwood points out that this word occurs in three distinct senses (1) certain days' labour that the tenant was bound to do for his lord; (2) damage accruing to goods in the course of transport, esp. by sea; (3) an arithmetical mean of a number of values. Everything (as usual) turns upon chronology; these three senses occur in the above order, the first being the oldest. The first sense Wedgwood takes to be corrupted from 'Dan. hoveri, duty-work due to the lord.' From this I wholly dissent, and hold to the explanation I have already given at p. 44. In other respects I agree with him, and at once acknowledge that my explanation fails to account fully for the senses 2 and 3. I take the right account to be this.

a. Sense 1, and the Low Lat. averagium, are to be explained from aver, a beast of burden, as to which I repeat what I have said at p. 44. This Low Lat. term presupposes the form average in Law French and English, which must have existed as the original form of averagium. Indeed, Littré gives the very form average in his Supplement, p. 29; and Godefroy gives O.F. average, service rendered by a vassal; A.D. 1382.

β. Such a word being in existence, when it became necessary to introduce F. avaris (with sense 2), this new word was assimilated to the E. pre-existent word which sounded like it, though really of different origin. This I can prove; for in Arnold's Chronicle (1502, repr. 1811), we find, at p. 112, where he is speaking of dues or tolls paid upon wine, that one must 'pai or doo pay [cause to be paid] all maner averays,' i.e. dues. But when, at p. 180, he has to use the word again, he speaks of 'customs or subsidies or average,' wrongly using a more familiar spelling. The form averays is more correct, and represents F. avaris, 'decay of wares or merchandise, leaking of wines; also, the charges of the carriage or measuring thereof;' Cot. This word (now spelt avarie) is the same as Span. averia, damage sustained by goods and merchandise, detriment received by ships and their cargoes (Neuman); Ital. avarria, damage, shore-duties (Meadows); whilst Torriano (ed. 1688) explains the same by 'a sea-phrase, viz. a consumption or distribution of the loss made, when goods are cast away on purpose in a storm, to save the vessel.' Mr. Marsh, in his notes on the first volume of Wedgwood's Dictionary, informs us (says Wedgwood) that the word 'occurs very early in French, Ital., and Spanish, in the sense of charges incurred from various causes, or duties levied by the authorities.' Whether the F. borrowed the word from Span. or Ital. is not quite clear, but I assume it was from the latter because of the closer agreement in the spelling, and the word may have been Venetian. It seems to have arisen 'in the commerce of the Mediterranean;' Wedgwood. = Arab. 'awār, a rent in a garment, a blemish, fault, defect; zāti 'awār, torn or spoilt merchandise; Rich. Dict. p. 1034. See Dozy; also Devic (Suppl. to Littré), who remarks that the sense of mod. F. avarie is rather 'duties' than 'damage,' which he thinks tells somewhat against this etymology. But Cotgrave gives 'decay of wares' as the first meaning, which is amply sufficient.

γ. Lastly, we come to sense 3. This is quite modern, and a purely E. extension of the term, due to writers such as Adam Smith. The word already meant the distribution among many of a loss incurred at sea, and the sense became still more general. δ. I conclude that sense 1 was mediæval, and (F., = L.); that sense 2 came in about 1500 (perhaps earlier), being (F., = Ital., = Arab.); and that sense 3 is a modern development, by English writers. The form which was earliest known to us has been retained throughout; sense 1, belonging to that form, is obsolete; whilst senses 2 and 3 do not rightly belong to that form at all.

AVOIRDUPOIS. The modern form is wrong. It should be avoirdepois; with e, not u. The spelling in old editions of Shakespeare is therefore better. We find avoir de pois in the Statutes of the Realm, i. 259, A.D. 1311; and aver de poy in the same, i. 156, A.D. 1309; also avoir-de-peise in an E. poem, about A.D. 1308; Reliq. Antiq. ii. 175. The F. avoir, though really an infinitive mood, was constantly used as a sb. (cf. leisure, pleasure), and the true sense was, accordingly, 'goods of weight,' i.e. goods sold by weight. We find aveyr (also avoir) with the sense of 'property' or 'goods' as early as in P. Plowman, C. vii. 32. This correction does not affect the etymology, except as relates to the du. The corresponding Latin words are, exactly, habere, de, and pensum. Avoirdupuis (as if, to have weight) is, in fact, a mistake for avoirdepois (goods of weight).

AVOW. The following note, by Dr. Murray, is from the Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880. 'Diez takes F. avouer from advōcare, Littré, Burguy, and Brachet from advōtare. Without presuming to "pose as an O. F. scholar," he thought there were certainly two O. F. avouer; 1:—Lat. advōcare, cf. louer, jouer:—lōcare, jōcare; 2:—Lat. *ad-vōtare, cf. vouer, dévouer, Lat. *vōtare, devōtare; the first two quotations in Littré belonging to advōtare, the rest to advōcare. Both verbs were adopted in Eng.; No. 1 before 1200, and still in use; senses to appeal to, call upon (as lord), acknowledge (as lord, or in any relation), own, confess; hence Avowal, and the obs. Avowry, Avowè, avow, an acknowledged patron, mod. Advowee and Advowson (Advocationem); No. 2 before 1300, in senses to bind with a vow, dedicate, take a vow, make a vow, now obs. From this the obs. n. avow, "An avow to God made he." The F. aveu belongs to avouer 1. In later Eng. they may have been looked upon as senses of one word, and were occasionally confused, as when a man avowed (advocavit) his sins, and avowed (advotavit) a pilgrimage by way of penance.'

AWAY. Cf. Icel. afuga, astray, lit. off the way, out of the way. This may have influenced the sense of the E. word.

AWKWARD. The forms afigr, ōfigr, which have been questioned, are in Vigfusson's Dictionary; the O. Sax. word which I print as awuh is given in the Glossary to the Heliland, where the letter which I print as v is denoted by a h with a line drawn through the upper part of the stem. Prof. Stephens calls attention to a passage too important to be passed over. In the Prologue to St. Matthew's Gospel, in the Northumbrian version, ed. Kemble, p. 2, l. 11, the Lat. word peruersa is glossed by wīðirworda vel afulic. Comparison with the Icel. and O. Sax. forms shews that afulic here stands for afuhlic (or afuglic), i.e. awk-like, with the sense of perverse. This is clear evidence that the mod. E. awk in awk-ward was represented by afuk in O. Northumbrian. Palsgrave has: 'auke stroke, reuers'; also: 'men ryng aukeswarde, on sonne en bransle.'

AWN, l. 3. For agun read agune; the form really given in the passage cited is the pl. agunes. We also find awene, Prompt. Parv. p. 18. The cognate Gk. word is ἀγνα, which comes nearer to it than ἀγνον.

AWORK. Stratmann says: 'not set awork, but only a work, occurs in Shakespeare.' This is hypercritical; as a fact, aworke occurs in the first folio, in Troil. v. 10. 38, which I actually cite; in the other three passages which I cite, it occurs as a-work. Thus the criticism fails in all four instances; I do not know what is meant by it.

AYAH, a native waiting-maid, in India. (Port., -L.) The spelling answers more nearly to the Span. aya, a governess, fem. of ayo, a tutor, but the word was certainly introduced into India by the Portuguese; the final h is an E. addition. - Port. aia, a nurse, governess; fem. of aio, a tutor of a young nobleman. Origin uncertain; Diez imagines it to be of Germanic origin; Wackernagel (with greater probability) suggests Lat. avia, by-form of ava, a grandmother, allied to anus, a grandfather. See Uncle. Minshew's Span. Dict. (1623) has aya, 'a nurse, schoolmistresse.'

AZURE. Rather (Arab., - Pers.) than (Arab.). The Arab. lajward is merely borrowed from Pers. lajaward or lajward, 'lapis lazuli, a blue colour'; Rich. Dict. p. 1251. The mines of Lajward (whence the name) are situate in Turkestan, N. of the Hindoo Koosh, and N.E. of Cabul.

BABBLE. Otherwise, babble may be taken as the frequentative of blab; see under Bubble. Since bab, blab, are of imitative origin, it makes little difference. Cf. G. pappeln.

BACHELOR. The derivation from uacca is that given by Diez; but it is by no means sure. Scheler remarks: 'Other etymologists, perhaps rightly, start from the Celtic [Welsh] bach, little, young, whence were naturally derived the old terms bachele, bachelette, young girl, maid, baceller, to make love, also to begin an apprenticeship. Bachele, in its turn, would have produced the form bachelier. Chevallet says that the Picard baichot, and in Franche-Comté paichan, are still used to mean a little boy.' I may add that bacelle, bacelette, a young girl, and baceller (verb) will be found in Roquefort; who also gives bacele in the sense of a piece of land, as much as twenty oxen could plough in a day, and thence deduces the word bachelor, a young man. The derivation remains, in fact, unsettled.

BACKGAMMON. Wedgwood remarks that 'his etymology is something more than a guess,' because the game is played on a tray-shaped board, and the word blot, used in the game, is Danish; see Blot (2). But it is remarkable that back, a tray, does not seem to appear either in Middle or provincial English (except, that in London, a back means a large brewer's tub); and it seems to me very doubtful if the game was originally played on 'a tray-shaped' board. On the contrary, it was called 'tables,' and I suppose that these 'tables,' or flat boards, had originally no protecting rim or ridge at the edge. I strongly suspect that Strutt is quite right, when he says, in his Sports and Pastimes, bk. iv. c. 2. § 16, that 'the words are perfectly Saxon, as bæc and gamen, i. e. Back-Game; so denominated because the performance consists in the players bringing their men back from their antagonists' tables into their own; or because the pieces are sometimes taken up and obliged to go back, that is, re-enter at the table they came from.' I object to the former of these solutions, because the men are not brought back, but forward; but the latter solution is highly probable. The word would then be wholly English; not a hybrid form.

BACON. Stratmann says the M. H. G. form is bache, not backe; Wackernagel gives both forms.

BAD. Section 5, which was merely a guess, should be cancelled. It is hardly worth while to discuss further this difficult and much-disputed word.

BADGER, subst. Mr. Nicol's note upon this word is as follows. 'This word, which originally meant "corndealer," is generally derived from the now obsolete F. bladier, with the same sense. Mätzner and E. Müller remark that this derivation offers serious phonetic difficulties; in fact, not only is there the loss of l, which is not unexceptional, but there is the consonantification of the i of the O. F. diphthong ie to dzh, a change of which no instance is known, though O. F. words with ie are very common in English. An even more serious difficulty, already pointed out in the Romania (1879, v. 8, p. 436)—I presume by Prof. G. Paris, not by Mr. Wedgwood—is that bladier, like many other words in Cotgrave, is a Provençal form, and consequently could not have got into Mid. Engl.; the real French word is blaiser (Cotgr. blayer), of which Mod. F. blaireau, "badger" (the animal), is a diminutive. Now blaiser would have given Mid. E. blayer, Mod. E. blair, just as chayere gave chayere, chair; whether blayer, blair has anything to do with the Scotch name Blair, I do not know, but it clearly is not badger. Assuming the loss of l, badger can hardly be anything but a derivative of Old F. blaage, which means both "store of corn" and "tax on corn." I do not find an Old F. blaagier recorded, but it probably existed, especially as there is, I think, no trace of the simple substantive (which would have been blage) in Engl.; the word, transliterated (or rather transsonated) into Latin, would be ablātīcārīum. It is very possible that examples of an Old F. word blaagier, and of a Mid. E. form blaeager, may yet be found; in any case the ordinary derivation from Prov. bladier (= Lat. ablātīcārīum) is historically and phonetically impossible.—H. Nicol. Mr. Wedgwood points out that there is actual evidence for a belief that the badger does lay up a store of corn. Herrick (ed. Hazlitt, p. 468) calls him the 'gray farmer,' alluding to his store of corn.

Chipping the mice filcht from the bin

Of the gray farmer.' King Oberon's Palace.

I see little difficulty in supposing that the Southern F. form bladier (given by Godefroy) may have reached us; indeed, we actually find the Anglo-F. form blader, a corn-dealer, both in the Liber Albus, p. 460, and the Liber Custumarum, p. 303. Still, badger answers better to an O. F. blaagier; and either way we are led back to the Low Lat. ablātūm, as already shewn. I may add that bager, a corn-dealer, occurs in Eng. Gilds, p. 424; and, spelt badger, in the Percy Folio MS., ii. 205; see Mätzner. Mr. Palmer's proposal to identify badger with some M. E. form of buyer is, in any case, utterly untenable.

BAFFLE. May be simply described as (Scand.). Jamieson also gives bachle, as a variant of bauchle, which is much to the purpose.

BAG. 'Bulga, bælgæ oððe bylge'; Wright's Voc. ii. 12 (11th century).

BAGATELLE. Not (F., -Ital.), but (F., -Ital., -Teut.).

BAILS. But we also find Low L. badallum, a gag; which makes it probable that the etymology of baillon is from Low L. badare, to gape, open the mouth, because a gag keeps the mouth open (Scheler). See Abeyance. Whether this really helps us to the etymology of bails, I cannot say. See also bail (1) in Godefroy.

BAIT. Add: So also Swed. beta, to bait, graze, feed, causal of bita, to bite; bete, pasture, grazing, also a bait; Dan. bed, a bait. The Icel. beita, to bait, is formed from beit, pt. t. of bita, to bite.

BAIZE. So also bays, i. e. baize, in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 235 (about 1502).

BAKSHISH, BACKSHEESH, a present, small gratuity. (Pers.) Pers. bakhshish, a present, gratuity, drink-money; Rich. Dict. p. 247; also bakhshish, id., and in Palmer, Pers. Dict. col. 72. Cf. Pers. baksh, part, share, bakhshidan, to give, bestow; bakhshah, bakhsh, a portion. Allied to Zend bak-h, to distribute, bāji, tribute, Skt. bhaji, to divide; Fick, i. 381 (✓BHAG).

BALAS-RUBY, a variety of ruby, of a pale rose red, or inclining to orange. (F., - Low Lat., - Arab., - Pers.) Formerly balais, balays. Palsgrave has 'balays, a precious stone, balé.' Cotgrave explains F. balay as 'a balleis ruby.' - F. balais, a balas-ruby (Littre); O. F. balais, balai (id.); also balay, balé, as above. - Low Lat. balascius, balascus, balasius, balassus, balagius, a balas-ruby (Ducange). Cf. Ital. balascio, Span. balax. - Arab. balakhsh, a ruby (given by Devic, Supp. to Littre, q. v.) - Pers. badakhsh, a ruby; so called because found at Badakhsh, or Badakhshan, 'the name of a country between India and Khurāsān from whence they bring rubies'; Rich. Dict. p. 249. Badakhshan lies to the N. of the river Amoo (Oxus), and to the E. of a line drawn from Samarcand to Cabul; see Black's Atlas. The change from d to l is precisely the change found in Lat. lacrima for dacrīma. Cf. Malagasy with Madagascar.

BALE (1). We even find the spelling balle in English; as in 'a balle bokrom,' a bale of buckram, Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 206. On the other hand, we find the Anglo-French bale, Stat. of the Realm, i. 218 (about A.D. 1284).

BALK (1). Stratmann gives the Icel. form as balki; I copy balkr from Vigfusson.

BALLAST. 'Ballast of a shyppe, lestage;' Palsgrave. In giving the etymology, I relied upon the Dan. form baglast as being the truest form. This is untenable, for it happens that baglast is merely due to popular etymology, the word being turned into baglast (back-load) to give it a sort of sense. Molbeck (Dan. Dict.) tells us that the Dan. word was formerly barlast, as in Swedish. Next, Ihre tells us that barlast was a corruption of ballast. We are thus brought back to ballast as being the oldest form; and, this being so, I at once accept Koolman's etymology, as given by me in sect. C, p. 49. That is, bal-last is bale-last, evil or worthless load, as being the unprofitable part of the cargo. See Bale (2) and Last (4).

BALM. Not (F., -Gk.), but (F., -L., -Gk., -Heb. f.). The Anglo-French forms are both basme (Philip de Thau, Bestiary, l. 234), and balme (Life of Edw. Confessor, 4354). Both from a form *balsme, which makes the identity with balsam certain. See note below.

BALSAM. Perhaps a Semitic word. Cf. Heb. básim, balsam. BAMBOO. The Canarese word is banbu; Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 57.

BANDY-LEGGED. Not (F. and E.), but (F. and Scand.).

BANGLE, a kind of bracelet. (Hind.) 'The ankles and wrists ornamented with large rings or bangles;' Archæologia, vol. viii. p. 256, an. 1787 (Davies). From Hindustani bangri, 'a bracelet, an ornament for the wrist; corruptly, a bangle;' Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 59.

BANJO, a six-stringed musical instrument. (Ital., = Gk.) A negro corruption of bandore, which occurs in Minsheu's Dict. (1627). Again, bandore is for bandora, described in Queen Elizabethes Achademy, ed. Furnivall, p. 111; Chappell's Popular Music, i. 224, ii. 776. Also written pandore: 'The cythron, the pandore, and the theorbos strike;' Drayton, Polyolbion, song 4. = Ital. pandora, pandura, 'a musical instrument with three strings, a kit, a croude, a rebecke;' Florio. = Gk. πανδοῦρα, πανδούρις, also πανδούρα, a musical instrument with three strings (Liddell and Scott). Not a true Gk. word; Chappell says the Greeks borrowed it from the ancient Egyptians.

BANK. 'Sponda, hó-banca;' i.e. a couch; Wright's Voc. i. 290. This authorises A. S. banca, a bench.

BANNERET. 'He is properlie called a banret, whose father was no carpet-knight, but dubbed in the field under the banner or ensigne;' Stanishurst, in Holinshed's Desc. of Ireland, ed. 1808, vi. 57. The Anglo-French banere (i.e. baneré) a banneret, occurs in Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 297, an. 1307.

BANSHEE, a female spirit supposed to warn families of a death. (Gaelic.) 'In certain places the death of people is supposed to be foretold by the cries and shrieks of benshi, or the Fairies wife;' Pennant, Tour in Scotland, 1769, p. 205 (Jamieson). = Gael. beanshi, a banshee; lit. fairy-woman (Macloed, p. 627). = Gael. bean, a woman; sith, a fairy. The Gael. and Ir. bean = O. Irish ben, is cognate with E. queen or queen; Curtius, i. 215. The Gael. sith also means 'peace;' cf. Irish sioth, peace, reconciliation; sioth, adj. spiritual, belonging to spirits or the other world; siothachan, a fairy.

BANTER. 'Occasions given to all men to talk what they please, especially the banterers of Oxford (a set of scholars so called, some M.A.), who make it their employment to talk at a venture, lye, and prate what nonsense they please;' A. Wood, Life, Sept. 6, 1678 (Davies). Explained by 'to jest or jeer' in Phillips, ed. 1706.

BANYAN. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, ed. 1665, p. 123, says that the English so named the tree because the bannyans (merchants) used to adorn it according to their fancy. This explains the reason for the name more fully, and confirms the etymology.

BARGE. This word should be marked as (F., = Low Lat., = Gk., = Egypt.). See below.

BARK (1), not (F., = Gk.), but (F., = Low Lat., = Gk.); or perhaps (F., = Low Lat., = Gk., = Egyptian.). There is certainly a Coptic word bari, a boat; for which see Peyron's Lexicon. The ultimate Egyptian origin of barge, bark (1), and barque, is, consequently, almost certain.

BARK (3). Cf. also Swed. bräka, Dan. bræge, Icel. brækta, to bleat (said of sheep).

BARNACLE (2). We also find Irish bairneach, barneach, a limpet. Possibly Celtic; see DuCange, who cites Giraldus Cambrensis, so that the word (in Celtic) is of some antiquity.

BARNACLES. In Neckam's treatise De Utilitatibus (12th cent.), pr. in Wright's Vocab., i. 100, the O. F. bernac occurs as a gloss upon Lat. camus. If this can be connected with E. branks, q. v., the word may prove to be Celtic, in the particular sense of 'instrument put on the nose of unruly horses.' Cf. camus, quo equi per labia coguntur domite stare, barnaklys; Reliq. Antiq. i. 7. Godefroy has O. F. bernicles, an instrument of torture. But, in the sense of spectacles, we find the spelling barnikles, in Damon and Pithias, Dodsley's Old Plays, i. 279 (Davies). It is not improbable that barnacles, spectacles, from prov. F. berniques, is distinct from barnacles in the other sense; though confusion between them was easy.

BAROUCHE, l. 1. For (G., = Ital.), read (G., = Ital., = L.).

BARRATOR, one who excites to quarrels and suits-at-law. (F.) Spelt barrator, barater, in Blount's Nomo-Lexicon; baratouere in Prompt. Parv. p. 115; see Way's note. The pl. barratours, deceivers, is in the F. text of Mandeville, Trav. p. 160, note f. From M. E. barat, fraud, Ayenbite of Inwyt, pp. 39, 61, 82; barete, strife, R. Manning, tr. of Langtoft, p. 274; baret, Ancrén Riwele, p. 172. The Anglo-French pl. barretours occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 364, an. 1361; and barat, deceit, in Life of Edw. Confessor, ed. Luard, l. 36. = F. barat, 'cheating, deceit, guile, also a barter;' Cotgrave. See Barter, p. 53.

BARRICADE. Generally given as (F., = Ital.); rather (F., = Span., = C.). Florio has baricata, barricada, 'a barricado.' Bar- ricada looks like a borrowing from Spanish; and it is important to notice that there does not seem to be an Ital. sb. barrica, from which the verb could be made; whereas, in Spanish, barrica is a barrel.

BARTER. Littre also suggests a Celtic origin, but refers to a different set of words. Cf. Irish brath, treachery, bradach, roguish, brathaim, I betray, Gael. brath, advantage by unfair means, treason, bradag, thievish; W. brad, treason, bradu, to plot.

BASHAW, the same as Pasha, which see (p. 424). Marlowe has basso, i Tamerlane, iii. 1. 1. 'Bachat, a Bassa, a chief commander under the great Turk;' Cot.

BASIL (1). Not (F., = Gk.), but (F., = L., = Gk.).

BASIL (3), the hide of a sheep tanned. (F., = Span., = Arab.) Halliwell gives bassell lether, mentioned in the Brit. Bibliographer, by Sir E. Bridges (1810), ii. 399. The form is corrupt, l being put for n; Johnson observes that a better spelling is basen. The Anglo-French form is bazene, bazeyne, Liber Custumarum, pp. 83, 84; also bazain, bazein, Gloss. to Liber Albus. = O. F. basanne, given by Palsgrave as the equivalent of a 'schepskynne towed,' i.e. a tawed sheep-skin; bazane, Cotgrave; mod. F. basane. = Span. badana, a dressed sheep-skin. = Arab. bitánat, the [inner] lining of a garment; Rich. Dict. p. 276; because basil-leather was used for lining leathern garments. = Arab. root batana, to cover, hide (Freitag). Cf. Arab. batn, the belly, interior part, Rich. Dict. p. 277; Heb. beten (spelt with teth), the belly. See Littre; also Devic, Supplement to Littre; and Engelmann.

BASNET, BASSETNET, BASSINET, a kind of light helmet. (F., = C.) Spelt bassetnet in Halliwell, who gives several examples. M. E. basinet, Rich. Cœur de Lion, 403; bacynet, id. 5266. = O. F. bacinet (Barguy, Roquefort); spelt bassinnet in Cot., who explains it by 'a small bason, also a head-piece.' Dimin. of O. F. basin, a basin; see Basin.

BASTARD. Scheler remarks that the great antiquity of the phr. jils de bast goes far to prove the etymology. He also cites from Burguy the precisely parallel O. F. form coitrari, a bastard, lit. 'son of a mattress,' from coitre, a mattress or quilt (see Quilt), and G. bankart, the same, lit. 'son of a bench,' G. bank. These instances are, to me, quite convincing.

BASTILE, BASTION, BATTLEMENT. Diez refers these words to Gk. βαράειν, to support, not to G. bast, bast. Accordingly, he separates the O. F. bast, a pack-saddle, from G. bast. The matter is as yet hardly settled.

BATTEN (1). Cf. also Swed. båtnad, profit, advantage; from båta, to profit. But these forms have a different vowel-sound, and are more closely allied to Icel. bæta than to batna.

BATTERY. The Anglo-French baterie, a beating (as in the legal phr. assault and battery) occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 48, an. 1278.

BAULK, the same as BALK, q. v.

BAY (3), an inlet of the sea; a recess. (F., = L.) There is great difficulty about this word. (1) We are certain that bay (of the sea) is from F. baie, with the same sense, of which word Littre gives no history. (2) We are certain that bay (in a building) is from F. baie, used as an architectural term. The difficulty is rather with the French words. My former view was that the words are identical, and I referred both to the Low Lat. baia, of which word not much is known. Littre separates the words, referring baie (in architecture) to the F. bayer, to gape; whilst baie, a gulf, is supposed by him to be connected with the Latin Baia. Whether the words are really connected is a doubtful point; but, if we approach the etymology on the easier side first, we may at once decide (with Littre and Scheler) that the architectural term, spelt baee in the twelfth century, is from the verb bayer, to gape, and meant, originally, 'an opening,' and hence, the space between the arches in a building, a division or partition; cf. prov. E. bay, a partition in a barn, &c. (see Halliwell). In fact, we find the Anglo-French baee, with the very sense of 'gap,' in Philip de Thaur, Livre des Creatures, l. 38. The F. bayer, O. F. baer, answers to Ital. badare, Prov. badar, to wait expectantly, orig. 'to gape idly vp and downe' (Florio); all from a Low Lat. badare, to gape. The Ital. stare a bada, to stand with open mouth, cited by Diez, suggests that the verb is of onomatopoeic origin; from the syllable ba, expressive of gaping. This view is taken by Diez, Scheler, and Littre. β. Next, we should note that the O. F. baee represents Low Lat. badata, and was orig. the fem. of the pp. signifying 'wide open,' and hence 'an opening.' This clears up the architectural sense of bay, and entirely agrees with Wedgwood's remarks, whose correction of my article I thankfully acknowledge. But Wedgwood asks us to go further, and to explain bay, a gulf, in a like manner. Scheler seems to incline to the same view, but remarks that, if so, Isidore of Seville should have used the form badia, not baia, when he said: 'Hunc portum ueteres uocabant Baias.' However, the Catalan form of bay is really badia (see Diez), and the Port. bahia, a bay, points back to the same form. Minshew's ^φ Span. Dict. (1623) has 'Baia, or Bahia, or Baya, a bay, or creeke.' We may either suppose *Baia*s in Isidore to be a corruption of *badia*s, or we may suppose (with Littré) that *Baia*s is merely copied from the Lat. Baia, in which case it is even possible that this *Baia*s is nothing but a place-name, and has but little to do with the question. I now feel inclined to accept Wedgwood's explanation to the full, merely putting a slight difference of form between badia, a gulf, a derivative from bad-are with suffix -ia, and badata, a bay of a building, the fem. of the pp. of the same verb. To the form badia may be assigned the same orig. sense of 'opening.' We may specially note the application to the embouchure or outlet of a river, which may conversely be regarded as an inlet of the sea: [as in] Telement exploiterent que en la bee du fleuve de Albule furent arrivez' (Godefroy).—Wedgwood, Contested Etymologies. Koolman, in his E. Frisic Dict., p. 78, takes precisely the same view, deriving bay, in both senses, from badare.

BAYONET. The word, as Richardson points out, occurs as early as in Cotgrave, who has: 'Bayonnette, a kinde of small flat pocket dagger, furnished with knives; or a great knife to hang at the girdle like a dagger.' Hence the usual story, that they were first made at Bayonne about 1650, cannot be correct. The etymology, from Bayonne (accepted both by Littré and Scheler) may still be right; but it is clear that the word at first meant a kind of dagger independent of a gun. The first edition of Cotgrave was that of 1611. There is a good note upon the word in N. and Q. 3 S. xii. 287.

BAY-WINDOW. I now admit the connection with F. béer; see remarks on Bay (3) above.

BDELLIUM. Rather (L.,—Gk.,—Skt.). Lat. bdellium.—Gk. βδέλλιον; also βδέλλα (Liddell and Scott). Other forms are βδοχών, μαδέλων, which Lassen derives from a supposed Skt. *madulaka, from Skt. mada, musk. With βδοχών cf. Heb. *bedólak*h; see Gesenius, Heb. Lex. 8th ed.—A. L. M.

BE. For 'Gael. bí, to exist,' read 'Gael. bu, was; and for 'W. byw, to live, exist,' read 'W. bod, to be.'

BEACH. Etym. doubtful. The following is curious; Trevisa, tr. of Higden, vii. 135, says that Canute placed his chair on the 'banke of the see,' Lat. in littore maris. Cf. 'we haled your barke over a barre of beach or pebble stones into a small riuer;' Hackluyt, Voyages, i. 355. Ihre particularly notes that the O. Swed. backe means not only 'hill,' but 'bank of a stream;' Rietz explains Icel. bakki by (1) bank (2) brink of a stream. I still incline to the opinion that it is a 16th cent. corruption of the Scand. word for 'bank.' Halliwell gives 'baich, a languet [tongue] of land, Ray;' but I cannot find it in Ray's Glossary. The Shropsh. baitech or batch means a valley, and is the same as M. E. bæch in Strattmann; this can hardly be the same word, the sense being quite unsuitable.

BEADLE. For (E.), read (F.,—M. H. G.). Certainly not English; but a French form. The A. S. bydel [not býdel, as printed] would only have given a M. E. form budel or bidel. Both these forms, in fact, occur; budel in the Owl and Nightingale, 1167; bidel in the Ormulum, 633, 9189, 9533. Bedel is a later form, borrowed from O. F. bedel (later bédau, as in Cotgrave).—M. H. G. bütel (mod. G. büttel), a beadle; O. H. G. putil.—O. H. G. put, stem of the pt. t. pl. of piutan, piotan, to offer, shew, proclaim, cognate with A. S. beóðan, to bid, proclaim; see Bid (2). In precisely the same way the A. S. bydel is derived (by vowel-change of u to y) from bud-on, pt. t. pl. of beóðan, to bid. The adoption of O. F. bedel in place of the native word is remarkable. This O. F. bedel was Latinised as bedellus, whence the term esquire bedell, as used in Cambridge University.

BEAGLE. M. E. begle, Squire of Low Degree, 771. It is printed as bogelle in Wright's Voc. i. 251, col. 1, which looks like a mistake for begelle.

BEAKER. So also Swed. bägare, Dan. bæger, a beaker; though these forms are of small value, being likewise borrowed from Low Latin.

BEAR (2), l. 2. Dele Lat. fera, which is cognate with E. deer.

BEARD, l. 1. Dele berde; the M. E. form is berd.

BEAVER (3), BEVER, a potato, short intermediate repast. (F.,—L.) 'Arete. What, at your bever, gallants?' Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, Act iv. M. E. beuer (= bever), 'drinkinge tyme, Biberium;' Prompt. Parv.—O. F. (Anglo-French) beivre, a drink, Gaimar's Chron. l. 5868; pl. beveres, id. l. 5994. Merely the substantival use of O. F. beure, to drink.—Lat. bibere, to drink. For similar examples of infin. moods as sbs., cf. leisure, pleasure, attainder, remainder. ¶ Quite distinct from beaver (2). It is still in use; Clare speaks of 'the bevering hour,' in his Harvest Morning, st. 7.

BECKON. See Luke i. 22, where we find the A. S. pres. part. bicniende, bedcniende, bécnende.

BED. In Chaucer, C. T. 295, or in the six-text edition, 293, the form used is beddes, gen. case. The nom. is bed, Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 31, l. 13.

BEDELL; see remarks upon Beadle (above).

BEDLAM. Bethlehem means 'house of bread.'—Heb. beth, house; lechem (hk=G. ch), bread.

BEDRIDDEN, l. 6. The reference is to Earle's first edition; in the second edition the suggestion is withdrawn. We find M. E. bedreden even in the singular, in Hampole, Pricke of Conscience, l. 808. It was prob. then already mistaken for a pp.

BEECH, l. 1. For 'M. E. beech,' read 'M. E. beche,' which is the form given, in the passage referred to, in Tyrwhitt's edition; beech being a mere misprint. The A. S. béce is not 'unauthenticated'; we find 'Fagus, béce' in Wright's Vocab. i. 285, col. 1, as is pointed out in Strattmann's Dictionary. I also find 'Esculus, béce,' id. ii. 29 (11th cent.).

BEEFEATER. It occurs in the Spectator, no. 625 (1714); and in the old play of Histrionastix, iii. 1. 99; see Simpson, School of Shakespeare, ii. 47. The word is wrongly marked (E.), as it is a hybrid. It is to be particularly observed that the word 'loaf-eater' to signify a servant occurs even in Anglo-Saxon! So little is it a new term. 'Gif man ceorlas hláf-étan ofslæhð'—if any one slays a churl's loaf-eater; Laws of King Æthelberht, § 25; in Thorpe's Anc. Laws, i. 8. Mr. Thorpe notes: 'lit. the loaf-eater, and consequently a domestic or menial servant.'

BEGUINE; p. 58, l. 18. By the expression '-alt is an O. F. suffix that is interchangeable with -ard,' I merely mean to compare -alt and -ard as to their use and force. Etymologically, they are of different origin, being allied, respectively, to G. wald, power, and hart, hard.

BEGUM, in the E. Indies, a lady of the highest rank. (Pers.,—Turk. and Arab.) Rich. Pers. Dict. p. 284, gives Pers. begum, a queen, lady of rank; also queen-mother, respectable matron. 'Queen mother' seems to be the orig. sense, as Devic explains that the word is compounded of Turk. beg or bey, a bey, governor, and Arab. um or umm, mother; so that it is lit. 'mother of the governor.' The Arab. umm, mother, is in Rich. Dict. p. 162. And see Bey. ¶ Another derivative of bey is the title beglerbeg, given to the governor of a province; see Massinger, Renegado, iii. 4. In Sandys' Travels (1632), we read of 'the Beglerbegs, the name signifying a lord of lords;' p. 47. This explanation is correct; beglér or beylér signifying lords, and beg or bey, a lord.

BEHAVE. Cf. also 'the whiche . . . behauid hym relygyously,' Monk of Evesham, c. 47, p. 95; 'Wyth an enarrabulle gestur and behaving of gladnes'; id. c. 19, p. 47. Also: 'Behaviour, maintien;' Palsgrave.

BEHEMOTH. Not really a Heb. word, but only connected with Heb. behēmāh, a beast, by a popular etymology. It is of Egyptian origin; from P-ehé-mau-t, the hippopotamus; see Gesenius, Heb. Lex. 8th ed. p. 97; Delitzsch, on Isaiah, xxx. 6; Smith, Bible Dict. s. v.—A. L. M.

BELFRY. An early use of O. F. bierfrois as a tower for bells, has been kindly pointed out to me. 'Definiendo, quod campana, seu campanæ, et campanile, quod bierfrois dicitur'; Constitutio, [dated] Nov. 7, 1226; in Pertz, Monumenta Germaniae, Legg. ii. 257. The change of r to l is so common that it clearly took place, in the first instance, without any influence upon it of the word bell; indeed, the form belfrid (for bercfrid) occurs even in German, and is given by Lexer (N. and Q. 6 S. v. 430). Confusion with bell, however, fixed its present sense.

β. The etymology of M. H. G. bercfrid or bercvrit is not given quite correctly at p. 59. It is not a compound of two nouns, but of a verb and noun, like E. dare-devil. The derivation, as given by Wackernagel, is from berg-en, to protect, guard, and M. H. G. vrit or frid (O. H. G. fridu, G. friede), peace, or rather personal security, which is the first sense of Icel. fríðr. Thus the sense was 'protecting personal safety,' or 'affording protection'; hence, a guard-tower, &c. The word has been tediously discussed; see N. and Q. 6 S. v. 104, 158, 189, 271, 297, 429, &c. The second syllable is from the same source as the second syllable in affray. See Frith.

BELLET. The A. S. belt appears in a Glossary pr. in Mone's Quellen und Forschungen, Aachen, 1830, p. 341, where we find: 'baltheus, belt.' Also: 'Balteum, gyrdel, oððe belt;' Wright's Voc. ii. 11 (11th cent.).

BEND (2), a slanting band, in heraldry; one of the nine ordinaries. (F.,—G.) Spelt bende in Book of St. Albans (1486), pt. ii., leaf e. 1. Not an E. word, but from O. F. bende, which was a modification of bande. The Anglo-French bende, in the heraldic sense, occurs in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 434. Cotgrave gives bende, the same as bande; and assigns 'a bend in armory' as being one meaning of bande. The M. E. bende also meant a fillet; see Cath. Anglicum, p. 27, note 7; and 'fillet' is another meaning assigned by Cotgrave to bande. Roquefort also gives O. F. bende as meaning 'bande, bandeau.'—G. band, a band, string, fillet, bond.—G. band, pt. t. of binden, to bind; see BAND (2). Der. bend-let, from F. bendelette, the same as bandelette (Cotgrave); dimin. of bande.

BENZOIN, a resinous substance. (F.,—Span.,—Arab.) Spelt benzoine in Lingua, iv. 3, in Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, ix. 419 (1607). Called also gum benzoine, and (by a singular popular etymology) gum Benjamin. Phillips (1706) calls it 'benjamin or benzoine.'—F. benjoin, 'the aromatick gumme, called benjamin or benzoine;' Cotgrave. The n seems to be a F. addition; Cotgrave also notes that benjoin Français meant 'the hearbe maisterwort, or false pellitory of Spain;' shewing that benjoin was not a F. word, but Spanish.—Span. benjui, 'benjamin or benzoine, gum-resin;' Neuman. Shewn by Engelmann and Dozy (and approved by Devic) to be a corruption (dropping the first syllable) of the Arab. name for benzoine, which was lubán jāwī, lit. Javanese frankincense. Perhaps lu- was confused with the Span. fem. def. art. la. The Arab. lubán means frankincense, benzoine; Rich. Dict. p. 1256; whilst jāwī means belonging to Java, Javanese. Benzoine really comes from Sumatra, but Devic says that the Arabs regarded Java as a name for that island also. With Arab. lubán, cf. Heb. levónáh, frankincense, from the root lavan, to be white (whence Gk. λίβαρος).

BERYL. The original of Gk. βήρυλλος may be the Skt. vaidurya. 'Vaidurya has been recognised as the original of the Greek βήρυλλος, a very ingenious conjecture, either of Weber's or of Pott's, considering that lingual d has a sound akin to r, and ry may be changed to ly and ll (Weber, Omina, p. 326). The Pers. billaur or ballūr, which Skeat gives as the etymon of βήρυλλος, is of Arabic origin, means crystal, and could hardly have found its way into Greek at so early a time;' Selected Essays, by Max Müller, 1881, ii. 352.

BESANT, BEZANT, a golden circular figure, in heraldry. (F.,—L.,—Gk.) Intended to represent a gold coin of Byzantium. M. E. besant, Gower, C. A. ii. 191; Wycliffe, Matt. xxv. 25.—O. F. besant, 'an ancient gold coin;' Cot.—Low Lat. byzantium, acc. of byzantius, a besant, coin of Byzantium.—Lat. Byzantium.—Gk. Βυζάντιον, the old name of Constantinople.

BESTEAD. Add: So also Swed. stadd, circumstanced; vara stadd i fara, to be in danger; &c.

BEVEL. Mod. F. biveau (Littre).

BEVER, a potation; see BEAVER (3) above.

BEVERAGE. It occurs in M. E.; in Mandeville, Trav. p. 141; Spec. of Engl. ii. 170, l. 56. Cf. O. F. beverage, s. v. Breuvage in Littre.

BEVY. In the Book of St. Albans (1486), leaf f 6, we find: 'A bevy of Ladies, A bevy of Roos [roes], A bevy of Quaylis.' Also 'a bevy of roos,' Reliq. Antiq. i. 154.

BIAS. Add: if this be right, the etymology is from bi-, double; and facies, a face. So Scheler.

BIBLE. Not (F.,—L.,—Gk.), but (F.,—L.,—Gk.,—Egyptian). The Gk. βύβλος, papyrus, is not a Gk. word, but borrowed from Egyptian. I suspect it is nothing but a debased spelling of the very word papyrus itself. The weakening of p to b, and the change of r to l, are very common phenomena.

BID (1). Add: So also Swed. bedja, to pray, pt. t. bad; Dan. bede, to pray, pt. t. bad.

BID (2). So also Icel. bjóða, to bid, pt. t. bað; Swed. bjuda, Dan. byde; &c.

BIGGIN, BIGGEN, a night-cap. (F.) In Shak. 2 Hen. IV. iv. 5. 27.—O. F. beguin, 'a biggin for a child;' Cot. He also gives beguiner, to put on a biggin. Palsgrave has: 'Biggayne, a woman that lyveth chaste;' and 'Byggen, for a chyldees heed;' for both words he gives F. beguine. Doubtless named from a resemblance to the caps worn by the nuns called Béguines, who, as Cotgrave remarks, 'commonly be all old, or well in years.' See Beguine. ¶ Biggin also occurs as a spelling of piggin.

BIGHT. M. E. bist, a bend; spelt byst, Gawain and the Grene Knight, 1349. 'The byst of the harme,' i.e. bend of the arm, Reliq. Antiq. i. 190. The A. S. form is byht, but this only occurs in a vague and extended sense; see Grein. The modern sense is due to Scand. influence.

BIGOT. The view here advocated was combated by Mr. Wedgwood in a letter which appeared in the Academy, Aug. 9, 1879; see a long article on the word in his Contested Etymologies.

BILLION. To be marked as (F.,—L.). The word was coined in the 16th century, and, apparently, in France; see Littre. Cotgrave has the word, explained by 'a million of millions.'

BIRD. Stratmann challenges the derivation of A. S. brid or bridd from brédan; but I do not give that derivation. I merely suggest a connection; and I still hold that the Teut. base is BRU, whence also A. S. bréowan, to brew, briw, broth, broð, broth, breáð, bread, bród, a brood, brédan, to breed, &c.; see Fick, iii. 217.

BISSON. Dr. Stratmann well suggests that the right form of the A. S. word is bisene, not a corruption of the pres. part. biseónd, but a correct form; compounded of bi, prefix, and the A. S. sene, visible, manifest, clear, usually written gesyne or gesene (the prefix ge- making little difference); see Grein, i. 462. Thus bisene would mean 'clear when near at hand,' hence short-sighted. The A. S. gesyne is allied to seón, to see.

BIT, (1) and (2). Bit (1) is A. S. bita, masc., gen. bitan; but A. S. bite, gen. bites, is mod. E. bite (Stratmann). As to the former, cf. 'æfter þám bitan,' after the bit (morsel), John xiii. 27; 'Frustum, bita,' Wright's Voc. ii. 151.

BITCH. 'Canicula, bicee;' Wright's Voc. ii. 23 (11th cent.).

BITTERN. Cf. Lat. butire, bubere, to cry as a bittern; baubari, to yelp. Almost certainly of imitative origin.

BIZARRE. Spelt bizarr, Gentleman Instructed, p. 559, 10th ed. 1732 (Davies); also in North's Examen, 1740, p. 31. Probably from Basque bizar, a beard; so that Span. bizarro may have meant bearded, and hence valiant; just as Span. bigote means a moustache, but hombre de bigote means a man of spirit and vigour.

BLACKGUARD. In the Accounts of St. Margaret, Westminster, p. 10, under the date 1532, we find: 'item, received for iiij, torches of the black guard, viijd.'; see Brand's Popular Antiquities, ed. Ellis, ii. 316. In Like Will to Like (1568), pr. in Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, iii. 323, we find: 'Thou art served as Harry Hangman, captain of the black guard.' The quotation from Stanishurst at p. 65, col. 2, is from p. 68 of vol. 6 (ed. 1808).

BLAIN. For A. S. blégen, see A. S. Leechdoms, i. 280, l. 1. ii. 128, l. 21.

BLAME. Not (F.,—Gk.), but (F.,—L.,—Gk.).

BLARE. Cf. O. Du. blaren, 'to lowe as a cowe;' Hexham.

BLASPHEME. Not (Gk.), but (L.,—Gk.).

BLAST. So also Swed. blást, wind, blowing weather; blåsa, to blow. Wiedgren also has the form bläst, a blast or gust of wind.

BLAZE. In Mone's Quellen und Forschungen, we find in a glossary the entries: 'facula, blæs' (sic), p. 402; 'faculá [abl.], blasen', p. 351; 'flammæ, blasen' (pl.), p. 303; 'faculis, blæsum', p. 403. Note also: 'Lampas, blase,' Wright's Voc. i. 26, col. 2.

BLEB, BLOB. In the Book of St. Albans (1484), leaf c 6, back, we find: 'When thou seeth (sic) thy hauke vpon his mouth and his chekis blobbed [puffed out], then she hath thys sekenes called Agnum.'

BLINDMAN'S BUFF. 'To play at blindman-buff;' Randolph, Works, p. 394 (1651), ed. Hazlitt (cited by Palmer). It is mentioned earlier, in the Prol. to The Return to Parnassus (1606). And, in 1598, Florio explains Ital. minda by 'a play called hoodman blind, blind hob, or blindman buffe.' Here buff is the F. buffe, 'a buffet, blow, cuffe, box, whirret, on the eare,' &c.; Cotgrave. From O. F. bufe (a word widely spread); see further under BUFFET (1). The explanation is given by Wedgwood as follows:—'In West Flanders buf is a thump; buffen, to thump, buf spelen, a game which is essentially blindman's buff without the bandaging of the eyes. One player is made the butt of all the others, whose aim is to strike him on the back without his catching them. When he catches the boy who gave him the last buffet, he is released and the other takes his place. See De Bo, West-Flemish Dict.' See also Koolman, East-Frisian Dict., who quotes the phrase dat geid up'n blinden buf, that is done (lit. goes) at hap-hazard (lit. at blind buff). And see buf in Diez.

BLITHE. So also Du. blijde, blijd, blij, glad, cheerful; Dan. and Swed. blid, mild, gentle. The connection with blink is doubtful. Dele section B of this article. The Teut. type is BLITHA, Fick, iii. 222. Root unknown.

BLOT (2). The expression 'made a blot,' with reference to the game of 'tables,' occurs in Dryden, Wild Gallant, Act i. sc. 3.

BLOTCH. Add: Cockayne renders A. S. blæc (dat. case) by 'blotch;' see A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 8, l. 1. Blotch might answer to an A. S. verb blacian, formed from blæc, black. Indeed, Ettmüller gives blacian, with two references, but he has been misled; in both places, the word is blácian, to grow bleak or pale; see Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 154, l. 7; p. 212, l. 7. But cf. Du. blaken, to scorch.

BLUDGEON. As the word is rare, I note the occurrence of Corn. blagon (with g as j), a bludgeon, in the Cornish miracle-play De Origine Mundi, l. 2709; see Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, p. 148.

BLUNDER-BUSS. Blunderbus, which seems to be a later name for the old harquebus, which was fired from a rest fixed in the ground, is not probably (as generally stated) a corruption of Dutch donderbus, G. donnerbüchse, but another form of the word blanter-bus. Blanterbus seems originally to have been plantier-bus, a derivative doubtless of Lat. plantare, F. planter, Ital. piantare, denoting the firearm that is planted or fixed on a rest before being discharged. . . King James, in 1617, granted the gunmakers a charter empowering them to prove all arms—'harquesbusse (plantier-busse, alias blanter-busse) and musquetoon, and every calliver, musquet, carbine, &c., Original Ordnance Accounts, quoted by Sir S. D. Scott, The British Army, vol. i. p. 405.—Palmer, Folk-Etymology. Cf. 'hat geschut planten, to plant ordnance;' Hexham. If this be so, blunder- is from Lat. plantare; see Plant. The syllable -bus is explained at p. 68.

BLUNT. The derivation given is much strengthened by the early occurrence of the word in the Ormulum with the sense of 'dull of sight,' and in close connection with blind. Moreover, the Ormulum contains many words of Scand. origin. 'Forr unnwis mann iss blunnt and blind off herrtess eyhe sihþe;' i.e. for the unwise man is dull and blind of the eye-sight of his heart; Orm. 16954. This quotation is given by Mätzner, who adopts the etymology which I have already given. The author of the Prompt. Parv. seems to have recognised the common origin of blunt and blunder. He gives: 'Blunderer, or blunt warkere [worker], hebefactor, hebeficus;' and 'Blunderunge, or blunt warkunge, hebefaccio.'

BLUSH, l. 3. It answers still better to A. S. blyscan, to glow, for which Stratmann refers us to Mone, Quellen und Forschungen (Aachen, 1830), p. 355, where we find: 'Rutilare, blyscan, blyscan.' In the phr. 'at the first blush,' i.e. at the first glance, we have the same word. See Joseph of Arimathea, 657; where Mätzner well translates blusch by G. Blick.

BLUSTER. Stratmann cites M. E. blusteren, Allit. Poems, ii. 886, P. Plowman, B. v. 521; but the sense of this verb is to wander aimlessly about, and it does not at all answer to bluster in the modern sense. It means nearly the same as blunder. But cf. E. Fries. blüstern, to bluster, from blüssen, to blow, allied to blasen, to blow.

* BOARD (2), verb, to go on board a ship; also to accost. (F., —Teut.) Though the sb. board is E., the verb is borrowed from F., and does not appear in M. E. It is common in Shak. in both senses; bord, to accost, is in Spenser, F. Q. ii. 2. 5, ii. 4. 24, &c.; see board in Nares. 'At length herself bordeth Æneas thus;' Surrey, tr. of Æneid, iv. 304. 'I borde a shyppe or suche lyke, faborde vne nauire,' Palsgrave. Short for aboard, which occurs in Cotgrave. —F. aborder, 'to approach, accost, abboord, board, or lay aboord;' Cot. —F. a, to (= Lat. ad); and bord, edge, brim, side of a ship. —Icel. bord, Du. board, board, side of a ship; see Board.

BOAST. Perhaps (E.). Not Celtic; the Corn. bost is merely borrowed from E. (Rhys). Perhaps the same may be said of the other forms. The Lowl. Sc. boist or boast means to terrify, intimidate; and the sb. means intimidation, being spelt bost in Wallace, x. 127, xi. 389; and boist in Douglas, tr. of Virgil (Jamieson). In the last instance, it is printed bost (riming with ost) in Small's ed. iii. 211, l. 16. The M. E. bost means 'noise,' K. Alisaunder, 4068; and 'pride,' Rob. of Glouc. p. 258 [not 285]; it is also spelt boost, P. Plowm. B. xiv. 247 (footnote). On the whole, it seems probable that the word is E., though not found in A. S. Wedgwood compares G. pusten, to puff or blow; which see in Weigand, who connects it further with G. pausback, a person with full, puffed cheeks. The G. pusten is much the same as bauschen, bausen, to swell, bunch out. Cf. also Swed. pust, a puff of wind, pusta, to blow, puff. The O. Swed. pust meant a pair of bellows (Ihre). In the Bremen Wörterbuch we have puusten, to blow, plüster, a pair of bellows, puustig, pusig, swollen with wind, puffed out. The Du. puist means a pimple, i.e. swelling. β. We trace in all these an imitative ✓PUS, to puff, blow; whence might well have been formed Swed. pust, a puff of wind, M. E. boos-t, a noise, orig. an explosion of air, a crack, as Wedgwood suggests. Cf. root No. 444, p. 746. The -t is a common A. S. noun-suffix, as in E. blas-t, din-t, fros-t, thirs-t; and blas-t is a closely parallel formation. The sb. boast is the older formation, the verb boast being taken from it. The senses of puffing out and noisy bragging are easily connected. See also note on Boisterous (below).

¶ In connection with this supposed root, it deserves to be mentioned that it is discussed in Koolman's E. Friesic Wörterbuch, s. v. bossem, bosom. He proposes to derive from it the word bos-om also, as meaning 'swelling,' that which is swollen out. And I believe he is right. We should then have, from ✓PUS, to puff out, the derivatives PUS-A, bag (Fick, iii. 167); PUS-TA, a puff, noise, boast; and PUS-A-MA, swelling, bosom. The p and b could easily be interchanged in an imitative root of this description; cf. buzz, birr, purrr, and Gk. φύσα, a blast, pair of bellows.

BODE. So also Icel. boð, a bid, offer, is derived from the stem of boð-inn, pp. of bjóða, to bid. So also Swed. bud, an offer, bud, a messenger, message, are from bud-en, pp. of bjuda, to bid; and Dan. bud, a message, is from bud-et, pp. of byde, to bid. Thus the precise relationship of bode to bid is completely made out.

BODKIN. Another M. E. form is bodekin, Prompt. Parv. p. 42.

The derivation usually given, from W. bidogyn, fails, from the fact that this word is accented on the o. We may, however, consider the suffix -kin as the usual E. dimin. suffix, and then bode-, bode- (two syllables) may be corruptions of the Celtic word now represented by W. bidog, Gael. biodag, Irish bideog, a dagger.

* BOHEA, a kind of tea. (Chinese.) So named from the Bohea hills. 'The Bou-y tcha (Bohea tea) takes its name from a mountain called Bou-y, situated in the province of Fo-kien;' Engl. Cycl. s. v. Tea. Fo-kien is Fukien in Black's Atlas, on the S. E. coast of China.

BOIL (2). The A. S. byle occurs in a gloss. 'Fruncus, wearte [wart], byle;' Wright's Voc. ii. 151. Add Swed. böld, a boil, tumour (where the d is excrescent); also Swed. bula, a bump, swelling. All the forms cited are from a base BUL, whence Goth. ufbailjan, to puff up. The Icel. beyla, a swelling, also belongs here; since the Icel. ey (by the usual vowel-change) is due to au. The mod. E. word ought rather to be bile, as it is provincially; the diphthong oi is a substitution due to confusion with the verb to boil, of F. origin. I now doubt the connection with bulge.

BOISTEROUS. Perhaps (E.); not (C.). When we find Low. Sc. boist used as another form of bost (see note on Boast above), it becomes probable that M. E. boist-nous or boist-ous is a mere extension from M. E. boost, bost, a loud noise. I now agree with Wedgwood's suggestion, and admit the justice of his criticism, that 'the objection to the derivation from the W. buystus, wild, brutal, ferocious, is not only the wide divergence of meaning, but the extreme improbability that a word of this abstract meaning should have been borrowed from the Welsh.' Thus boisterous is noisy, or boast-ful (in the early sense of boast). Cf. 'Boustuousnesse, impetuositie;' Palsgrave.

BOLE, l. 1. The M. E. bole cited is the dat. case. Stratmann gives the nom. as bol, but without a reference. The nom. is written bole in the Destruct. of Troy, 4960.

BOLT. 'Catapultas, speru, boltas;' Wright's Voc. ii. 18 (11th cent.). The Low L. catapulta means a bolt as well as a catapult.

BOLT, BOULT, to sift meal. The M. E. pp. builtedd (= builte) occurs in the Ormulum, l. 992. Wedgwood objects that 'coarse woollen cloth is wholly unfit for the process of boulding flour, which requires a thin, open fabric.' But it is rather my explanation of the F. word that is at fault. The F. buler merely meant originally 'reddish,' and may have been used for a reddish or brownish stuff of any texture. That O. F. buileter (Anglo-French bulter, Liber Albus, p. 705) is precisely the Ital. burattare, 'to bould or sift meal' (Florio), is clear enough. Cf. also buratto, 'a boulder or sieve.' The explanation already given seems to me sufficient; see Scheler, Diez, and Littré, who are all agreed about it. In particular, Littré adduces the O. F. buiretel as being the form of blueau found in the 13th century. Godefroy cites farine buretales, boulded flour, A. D. 1285. And it is worth observing that the mod. F. bluter, to bould, is pronounced bulter in the Walloon dialect of Mons (Sigart).

* BOLUS, a large pill. (L., —Gk.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. He also explains it as a clod of earth, lump of metal, &c. —Low Lat. bölus (not Lat. bölus), which is merely a Latinised form of Gk. βῶλος, a clod, lump of earth, a lump (generally). Perhaps allied to Gk. γαλῶς, a round vessel, and to Skt. gola, Icel. kúla, a ball. See Wharton, Etyma Græca; Fick, i. 76.

BONFIRE. When we find, in Cathol. Anglicum, A. D. 1483, the entry 'bane, os,' succeeded by 'bane-fire, ignis ossium,' and again find the spelling bane-fire in Lowland Scotch in the times of James VI., we cannot resist the conclusion that the word was understood to mean bone-fire from the time when it first appears for more than a century onwards. Palsgrave's curious spelling bonne-fyre is at once explained by his preceding entry, viz. 'Bonne of a beast, os.' The spelling bone-fire occurs, not only in the extract given at p. 70, but even in passages where it has the sense of a fire made by way of rejoicing; see Fabyan, an. 1554–5, Hall, Hen. V., an. 3. In the Bible of 1551, 2 Chron. xxi. 19, bonefire translates the Lat. exequias. Cooper (see below) seems to use bonefire to signify an actual cremation of the dead. Another suggestion is sent me by a correspondent in Belgium, who says: 'Frequent allusion is made in Flemish to bone-fires. See Kilian, s. v. Weedaschen. When the weather happens to be very cold, one man will meet another in Bruges and say, Koud ek? Ze branden hoorns buiten de Dampoorte, people are burning horns outside the Dam-gate. Horns, bones, old shoes, used to be burnt in times of epidemics, to purify the air. I have seen it done.' Cooper's Thesaurus (1565) has: 'Pyra, a bone fier wherein mens bodies weare burned; erigere pyram, to make a bone fier.' The same spelling occurs repeatedly in passages cited in Brand's Antiquities, ed. Ellis, i. 299–311; two of these are dated (p. 309), in the 8th year of Hen. VII. and in the first year of Hen. VIII. respectively. At p. 298 he quotes from MS. Harl. 2345, art. 100:—'in vigilia beati Johannis, colligunt pueri in quibusdam regionibus ossa et quedam alia immunda, et in simul cremant.' In N. and Q. 3 S. i. 109, is a quotation from J. O. Daly's Poets and Poetry of Munster, i. 256, as follows: 'Deantar cnaimh-theinnte agus sid stoc na pibe,' i. e. let bone-fires be made and the bag-pipe blow. Here cnaimh-theinnte is unambiguous, being a plural compound from cnaimh, bone, and teinne, fire.

BONITO, a fish of the tunny kind. (Span., = Arab.) Described in Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 133 (ab. 1565). 'A bonito-fish,' Minshew (1627).—Span. bonito, 'a fish called a tunnie;' Minshew's Span. Dict. (1623).—Arab. baynīs, 'the fish called bonito;' Rich. Dict. p. 312. Here the final s of baynīs is not the usual s, but the 4th letter of the alphabet which, according to Palmer, is properly sounded as E. th in both.

BOON. Wedgwood remarks: 'There is no doubt that this confusion with Fr. bon has taken place, but it is not with bon in the fundamental sense of good, but in a special application which Skeat has not noticed. Bon in Old French was used in the sense of good pleasure, what seems good to one, and thence will, desire, boon. "Se tu veus fere mon plaisir Et tout mon bon et mon desir:"—Barbazan, Fables et Contes, iii. 8.' This makes the matter still clearer. Etymologically, there is but little difference; the sb. bon is merely Lat. bonum, neut. of bonus. Besides, there are passages in which boon is the mere adjective, as bone deserts = good deserts, Return from Parnassus, ii. 5, ed. Arber, p. 29, l. 31 (where Hazlitt prints boon deserts); so also boon sparks = fine fellows, Hazlitt's Old Plays, xii. 270, a parallel phrase to boon companions.

BOOT (1). Rather (F., = Low L., = Gk.). F. botte.—Low L. botta, a boot, the same word as Low L. butta, a cask, butt.—Gk. bûris, bûris, a flask. ¶ The G. bütte or butte is merely a borrowed word from Low Latin. See Bottle (1).

BORAGE. M. E. borage (14th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. i. 51, l. 4. 'Bourage, borache;' Palsgrave.

BORE (3). M. E. bare (Northern dialect) in the comp. se-bare, i. e. sea-bore, surge; see Spec. of English, ed. Morris and Skeat, pt. ii. p. 90, l. 38.

BORROW. It should have been more explicitly stated that the A. S. borh, a pledge, is derived from the stem of borg-en, pp. of beorgan, to protect. So also Du. borg is from the stem of ge-borg-en, pp. of Du. bergen, to save.

BOUDOIR. Perhaps allied to Pout, q. v.

BOLT, to sift. See Bolt, p. 69; and see note on Bolt above.

BOUND (2). The Breton bôden, a cluster of trees, a thicket, is given in Legonidec, and is derived from Bret. bôd, a tuft of trees, a cluster, clearly the same word as Irish boi, a cluster, bunch. The suggested connection with Gael. bonn and E. bottom must be given up. We find Anglo-French boundes, bounds, limits, Stat. of Realm, i. 144, an. 1305; spelt bundes, id. 138, an. 1300; bondes, Year-Books of Edw. I., iii. 71. Also the verb bunder, to fix limits, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 332. Bonde = bodne, by transposition (Scheler). BOUND (3). Cf. 'boone home' = homeward-bound; An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, iv. 345.

BOUQUET. To be marked as (F., = Low L., = Teut.).

BOURN. To be marked as (F., = C.).

BOUSE. M. E. bousen, about A. D. 1308; Reliq. Antiq. ii. 175.

BOUT, BOUGHT. The Dan. bugt, sb., a bend, is not immediately derived from bugne, to bend; but bugt, sb., and bugne, intrans. verb, are both alike derived from the base bug-, occurring in Icel. bug-usk, pt. t. pl. (reflexive) of the lost strong verb *bjúga, cognate with A. S. beogan, to bend. The same base occurs again in A. S. bug-on, pt. t. pl. of beogan (as before). We also find bugt in Swedish, meaning 'bend, curve, bent, direction, gulf, bay;' and the Swed. weak verb buga, to bow, make a bow, bend down.

BOUT (2). (F., = O. H. G.) The etymology given of bout, a turn, at p. 72, is right as far as it goes, and explains bought in Spenser and Levins, and (probably) Milton's 'winding bout;' cf. 'bought of the arme, le ply du bras;' Palsgrave. But, as Wedgwood points out, it is highly probable that, 'in the expressions of a drinking-bout, a bout of fair or foul weather,' we have to do with a different word. Cotgrave gives: 'par boutées, by fits, or pushes, not all at once, fitsoons, now and then;' which just answers to E. by bouts. As boutée is merely the fem. pp. of bouter, to thrust, to butt, it is clear that a bout is a butt, i. e. a thrust. Cf. Span. bote, a thrust, Ital. botta, 'a blowe, a stroke, a time,' Florio. I suppose E. bout to answer to O. F. bot, a thrust (mod. F. bout), and to have preserved a sense of the word which is lost in the mod. F. form, but preserved in boutée, as given in Cotgrave. The spelling with ou suggests that we received the word from O. F.; but it is shewn, under Butt (1), q. v., that O. F. boter is of Teutonic origin. Consequently, Wedgwood well remarks that 'the Du. bot or botte, a stroke or blow (ictus, impulsus—Kilian), as well as the nasalised bonte, is used in the dialect of West Flanders exactly as E. bout. Een bot regen, eene botte wind, vorst: a bout of rain, wind, frost. Bij botten; by bouts or intervals. Eene botte, or bonte goed, nat, droog, weder: a bout of good, wet, dry weather. De kinkhoest is bij bonten: the chincough comes in fits;' see De Bo, West Flem. Dict. So also Koolman, in his East Fries. Dict., gives the form bot, as in elk bot wen't rāgend, every time that it rains.

BOW (1). Add Swed. buga, to bow down, though this is only a weak verb; more important are the Icel. boginn and bugusk, occurring as the pp. and pt. t. pl. (reflexive) of a lost strong verb *bjúga (cognate with the A. S. beogan), of which the pt. t. must have been baug, and the Teut. base BUG, answering to Aryan ✓BHUGH, as already given.

BOWLINE, l. i. The definition 'a line to keep a sail in a bow' cannot be right, though it agrees with what is commonly given in Webster's Dictionary and elsewhere. The Icel. form of the word, bóg-lína, distinctly links it with Icel. bógr, the bow of a ship; see Bow (4). It follows that it has no etymological connection with the verb bow, to bend, a fact which seems never to have been hitherto suspected by any writer of an English dictionary. As a fact, the bow-line keeps a sail straight, and prevents it from being bowed. Webster defines it as 'a rope fastened near the middle of the leech or perpendicular edge of the square sails by subordinate parts called bridles, and used to keep the weather edge of the sail tight forward, when the ship is close-hauled. The true sense is 'side-line,' and it takes its name from being attached to the side or shoulder of the sail. See the Icel. Dict., s. v. bógr, which is explained as 'the shoulder, shoulder-piece, bow of a ship; also used of the side of a person or thing; á hinn bóginn, on this side, á báða boga, on both sides.' It follows that the words which take the form bow require special care. On the one hand, we have bow (1), bow (2), bow (3), all from the ✓BHUGH; on the other, we have bow (4) and bow-line, allied to bough and to the Skt. bāhus, an arm, from a different root.

BOX (4). In the phr. 'to box the compass,' the word is probably Spanish.—Span. boxar, to sail round an island (Meadows). The Span. sb. box means a box-tree, a piece of box-wood, and the act of doubling a cape. Diez points out that Span. bruxula or brujula, a sea-compass, has an intrusive r, and is derived from Lat. buxus, box-tree. It is therefore probable that there is a real connection between box (4) and box (1).

BRACE. The O. F. brace once actually meant 'the two arms;' see Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française. This explains E. brace in the sense of 'pair.' The braces of a ship are from the notion of holding firmly; cf. embrace.

BRACELET. An example of O. F. bracel, a defence for the arm, may be found in Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française.

BRACKET. The word actually occurs as early as in Minshew's Dict., ed. 1627, with the remarkable spelling bragget, and is explained to mean 'a corbell.' This completely alters the case, and suggests a totally different origin. It seems to be allied to O. F. bragnette, 'a codpiece,' Cot., and to Span. bragüeta, 'the opening of the forepart of a pair of breeches, in architecture, a kind of quarter or projecting mould,' Neuman. If so, it must be allied to E. breeches. Phillips, ed. 1706, explains brackets as small knees, or pieces of wood used to support galleries in ships, like Span. bragada de una curva, the throat of a knee of timber (as a nautical term), derived from Span. braga, breeches. Florio has Ital. brachetta, 'a cod-piece.'

BRAD, l. i. We actually find M. E. brad, used to gloss L. aculius (= aculeus) in Wright's Voc. i. 234, col. 2, l. 2. But this is a Northern form; the same Vocabulary has gat for 'goat,' and ra for 'roe,' p. 219. This is one more proof of its Scand. origin.

BRAKE. Cf. also Swed. linbråka, i. e. a flax-brake, from lin, flax. Tredgold, in his treatise on Railroads, London, 1825, gives a full account of the use of the brake-wheel as applied to locomotives; N. and Q. 4 S. xi. 428.

BRAT. See note on Cloth below.

BRAVADO. The fact seems to have been that the English turned -ada into -ado in certain words, such as barricado, ambuscado, &c.

BRAZE (2). To be marked as (E.). We actually find 'aero, ic brasige,' in Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 215, l. 17.

BREED. The A. S. Dictionaries do not properly authorise this word. Yet it occurs (as Mr. Sweet points out) in Ælfric's Homilies, ii. 10, in a passage which also has the rare sb. bród. It is there said of bees, that 'of ðām hunige hī brēdað heora bród,' i. e. with the honey they nourish their brood. This fixes the word beyond dispute; so that A. S. brēdan is derived from bród, a brood (by vowel-change from ó to e), precisely as fēdan, to feed, is from fód, food.

BREESE. Stratmann's Dictionary greatly helps us here; the M. E. form is bresse, Wright's Voc. i. 255, col. 2 (where crestrum must surely be a misprint for oestrum). The A. S. forms briosa, bressa, are both authorised, occurring in glosses; see Leo's Glossar, and Bosworth. Leo takes briosa to result from brimsa by loss of m, and the words are obviously very closely related. Hence the greater part of my article may stand. Cf. also Swed. broins, a horse-fly.

BREEZE, subst., cinders. The following note is by Mr. Nicol. 'Mr. Skeat, who explains breeze as a name given in London to ashes and cinders used instead of coal in brick-making, identifies the word with the Devonshire briss, "dust," "rubbish," which he and his predecessors derive, no doubt correctly, from F. bris, "breakage," formerly also "fragments." The meanings, however, of breeze and briss do not agree, for breeze, far from being dust or rubbish, is the valuable ashes and cinders separated from dust and rubbish heaps; and though F. bris du charbon de terre is "coaldust" or "small coal," bris alone has not this meaning. The forms differ still more, both the vowels and the final consonants of breeze and briss being irreconcilable. On the other hand, breeze agrees phonetically exactly with O. F. brese, originally "live coals," afterwards also "cinders," whose e corresponds regularly to the accented a of its Teutonic primitive brasa (which exists in the Swedish brasa, "fire," and in the verb brasa, found, with slightly varying meanings, in all the Scand. languages). The original vowel being kept when unaccented, appears in the F. verb braser, and in the derivative from which, as is well known, comes the Eng. brasier (brazier), "a pan to hold live coals." Having only recent examples of Engl. breeze, I do not know whether the spelling with es is Early Mod., and consequently shows that in Mid. Engl. the word had éé (close), the invariable representative of the identical O. F. sound; if it is, it makes the formal identity of E. breeze and O. F. brese certain. The Mod. F. spelling braise with ai is, like clair, pair, aile for O. F. cler, per, ele, simply an orthographical recognition of the Late Old or Early Mod. F. change of é to ai in these words; Palsgrave, in translating "cynders of coles" by breze, keeps the O. F. vowel-letter. Any difficulty as to the meaning is, I think, removed by the fact that (as may be seen in Bellows's excellent little pocket dictionary, 1877, under braise) F. braise is still the correct technical translation of Engl. breeze, cinders."—H. Nicol. Mr. Nicol subsequently sent me the following note. 'It turns out that in some O. F. dialects there really was a form braise with the diphthong ai, corresponding to a primitive brasia (Ital. bragia). Thus breeze is from O. F. brese, braise, allied to F. braser, for which see Braze (1). Cf. Walloon braizettes, small coal (Sigart).

BRIAR. We already find 'arguens (or anguens), breer' in the very old Epinal gloss; see Appendix B. to Report on Rymer's Fœdera, p. 154, l. 7. This shews that the A. S. spelling was breer as early as the eighth century. If the Irish preas is related, it must have been borrowed from a Teut. form.

BRISK. Dele Section B. If brisk is Celtic, it cannot be cognate with fresh and frisky.

BROIL (1), to fry, roast over hot coals. (F.,—Teut.) Dele section β of this article. The M. E. broylen, or broilen clearly answers, as Stratmann points out, to O. F. bruiller, to broil, grill, roast, given in Roquefort with a quotation from the Image du Monde. And this O. F. verb can hardly be other than an extension of O. F. bruir (mod. F. brouir) used in the same sense, for which see Littré and Roquefort; the mod. F. brouir merely means 'to blight.' This O. F. bruir is of Teut. origin; from the verb represented by M. H. G. brüen, brüen, brüen, to singe, burn, G. brühen, to scald, Du. broejen, to brew, hatch, grow very hot; which are clearly allied to E. brew. See Brew. ¶ That the F. word is difficult, appears from the dictionaries. Brachet gives it up; Roquefort tries to get brouir out of Lat. urere (1); Hamilton connects it with L. pruina. But see Littré, Scheler, and Burguy. Note that this O. F. bruiller is distinct from F. brûler, O. F. brusler.

BROIL (2), a disturbance, tumult. (F.) Dele section β of this article. As to the etymology of F. brouiller, to disorder, I am at a loss. We must connect it with Ital. broglia, 'a hurlie burlie, a confusion, a huddle, a coyl,' Florio; and with brogliare, 'to pill, spoile, marre, waste, confound, mangle, toss, disorder,' id. Diez connects broglia with Low L. brogilus, also broilus, brolium, a park, or enclosure where animals were kept for the chase, which agrees with O. Ital. broilo or broillo, explained by Florio as a kitchen-garden, mod. Ital. bruolo, a garden. Cf. also Port. brulha, the knob out of which a bud rises, abrolhar, to bud, blossom, G. brühl, a marshy place overgrown with bushes. The notion seems to be that, from a substantive meaning a park or grove, also a thicket or overgrowth of bushes, was formed a verb signifying to be confused or entangled. The reader must consult Diez, Scheler, and Littré. Scheler refers it to G. brudeln, brodeln, to bubble, brodel, vapour; cf. F. brouillard, mist. In Mahn's Webster a heap of supposed cognates are given, many of which I cannot find, and others do not seem to agree with the interpretation given. I cannot think that the word is, as yet, fully solved.

BROKER. Perhaps (F.,—O. Low G.) rather than (E.). The M. E. form is almost invariably brokour or brocour (as pointed out by Dr. Chance in N. and Q.); see P. Flowman, B. ii. 65, iii. 46, v. 130, 248; C. iii. 60, 66, vii. 95. This answers to Anglo-F. brocour, Liber Albus, 400; and the suffix -our is certainly F. (= Lat. -atorem). The Anglo-F. word is more commonly abrocour or abrokour, Lib. Alb. 261, 268, 282, 315, 586, 722; and we even find abroker, vb. to act as broker, 668. The corresponding Low Lat. form is abrocatore, id. 249, 347, 401, 402, 636. I understand Dr. Chance to suggest that this is derived from F. broc, 'a steane, great flagon, tankard, or pot,' Cotgrave; in which case the orig. sense may have been a seller of liquids by retail; cf. mod. F. broc, a jug, jugful. The F. broc, Ital. brocca, is supposed to have been a pitcher of a pointed form; see Brooch. β. But I suspect the word to be of Teut. origin, and to have come from the Netherlands. Cf. E. Fries, broker, a broker, schipsbroker, a ship-broker (Koolman); also brukere, a broker, in Schiller and Lübben's Mid. Low G. Dict. Koolman thinks, as I do, that the word is allied to O. Du. broke, bruyck, breuck, custom, use (Kilian), and to the A. S. brúcan, to use, E. brook. The spelling with o or u renders this opinion most likely; see also Mätzner. I suppose that the word was not formed from the verb directly, but from the sb. signifying 'use,' &c. As this sb. took the form bruche in M. E., it would follow that broker was not an orig. E. word, but borrowed (as above said) through F. from the Netherlands; as is further suggested by the occurrence of E. Fries, broker, Mid. Low G. brukere, as cited above. Hence also we may explain the sense of the word; a broker is not, literally, a 'user,' but 'one who determines the usages' of trade. This is well illustrated by the Danish, in which language (by the usual change of k to g), the sb. is spelt brug, with the senses of 'use, employment, practice, custom, usage, trade, business;' whence brugsmand (lit. broke-man), a tradesman, one who conducts a trade or business (den som driver et vist Slags Brug eller Næring). Danish even has the form jord-bruger, a farmer, which is, literally, an 'earth-broker,' one whose business it is to till the earth. Cf. also Swed. bruk, custom, use, fashion, practice, work, business, employment. But they who prefer to derive the word from F. broc may do so; there is little to be said against it.

BROOD. See note on Breed (above), p. 787.

BROW. Also A. S. bréuw. We find acc. pl. bréuwas, dat. pl. bréuwum, in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 38. Also A. S. bréauw; 'Palpebræ, bréuwas,' Wright's Voc. 1. 42, col. 2. The pl. bréuwas also occurs in Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, c. 28, ed. Sweet, p. 192.

BRUISE, l. 7. The A. S. brýsan is thoroughly authorised; not only does it occur in Be Domes Dæge, ed. Lumby, l. 49, but in Matt. xxi. 44, we have both tó-brýsed, i.e. utterly crushed, and tó-brýst, 3 p. s. pr. t. of the compound verb tó-brýsan. But this A. S. brýsan would have given M. E. brisen, mod. E. brise or brize, whereas we even find the spelling broysyd, bruised; Monk of Evesham, ed. Arber, p. 73, last line. We must therefore prefer the F. etymology. β. The A. S. brýsan may be compared with Du. broos, broos, fragile; note also G. brots-ame, a crumb (broken bread), which Fick (iii. 219) connects with M. H. G. brinzan, A. S. bréotan, to break in pieces. The base of A. S. bréotan is the Teut. BRUT, to break in pieces, Fick, iii. 218; which suggests for the A. S. brýsan a parallel base BRUS. γ. The O. F. bruiser, brisier, is probably from the same Teut. base.

BUDGE (2). The Anglo-French form boge (fur), in the Stat. or the Realm, i. 380, an. 1363, precisely answers in form to O. F. boge, variant of bouge, a wallet (Burguy). Palsgrave spells the word bouge.

BUFFALO. Perhaps the Gk. βούβαλος is a foreign word in Gk., its Gk. form being merely influenced by βοῦς. Βουβαλῖς was orig. an antelope, not a wild ox, and is said to be N. African (Herod. 4. 192). See N. and Q. 2 S. ix. 1 (G. C. Lewis).

* BUGLOSS, a plant. (F.,—L.,—Gk.) Lit. 'ox-tongue.' Spelt buglosse, Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 12.—F. buglosse, 'buglosse;' Cot.—Lat. buglossa; also buglossos (Lewis and Short).—Gk. βούγλωσσος; so called from the shape of the leaves.—Gk. βοῦς, stem of βοῦς, an ox; and γλῶσσα, tongue. See Cow (1) and Gloss (2).

BUILD. I now find that the A. S. byldan, to build, is authorised; but I do not think it is at all an early word. It makes little ultimate difference, but enables us to trace the word quite clearly. Thus mod. E. build=A. S. byldan, to build, formed (by vowel-change of o to y) from A. S. bold, a dwelling. This A. S. bold has been shewn to be of Scand. origin. The verb and sb. occur together in the very first line of the short poem entitled 'The Grave,' pr. in Thorpe's Analecta Anglo-Saxonica, p. 153. 'De wæs bold gebyld'—for thee was a dwelling built. Just below, the pp. is spelt ibylde, which is quite a late spelling. We also find M. E. byllen, to build, directly from O. Swed. bylja; the pt. t. bylled is in Mandeville, Trav. p. 98.

BULB. Prof. Postgate takes L. bulbosus to be merely borrowed from Gk. βολβός, and says that we may then assign to 'bulb' or 'onion' the sense of 'edible root', from ✓GAR, to devour, eat, whence Gk. βορός, gluttonous, βορά, meat; cf. γορ-άπιες, explained ράφανοι, by Hesychius, from the same ✓GAR. See VORACIOUS. But Wharton, in his Etyma Græca, connects βολβός with Lat. globus. See GLOBE.

BULGE. The M. E. pp. bolgit, bulging out, occurs as an epithet of ships, A. D. 1400; see Reliq. Antiq. ii. 24.

BULLACE. l. 4. For 'Irish bulos, a prune,' read 'Irish bulistair, a bullace, a sloe; the form bulos, quoted by O'Reilly, is taken from Shaw's Gaelic Dictionary, and is Gaelic, not Irish.'

BULLION. sect. B. I am asked to explain this. I find mod. F. billon explained in Hamilton as copper coin, base coin, also, the place where base coin is carried to be melted and coined again. This last sense precisely agrees with that of O. F. bullione, the mint. It is remarkable that, as shewn in Trench, Select Glossary, the E. bullion was once used as an equivalent for F. billon in the sense of debased coin. There is thus abundant confusion between E. bullion and F. billon, obviously due to the similarity in sound, and to the preservation of the O. F. word in E., while it was lost in French. We may also note that one sense of bullion in Blount's Nomolexicon is 'sometimes the King's Exchange or place, whether [whither] gold in the lump is brought to be tried or exchanged; 27 Edw. 3. Stat. 2. cap. 14; 4 Hen. 4. cap. 10.' Spelt bolton, Arnold's Chron., ed. 1811, p. 229; bollyon, Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 305 (1586).

BULRUSH. see under RUSH (2), p. 520.

BULWARK. Spelt bulwarck; Life of Lord Grey of Wilton (C. S.), p. 24; date, before 1562. Spelt bulwarke in Holinshed (see the same page). It also occurs in Skelton, Erle of Northumberlande, l. 48; ed. Dyce, i. 8; and the pl. bulwerkis is in Arnold's Chronicle, ed. 1811, p. 287. And we even find M. E. bulwerkes, A. D. 1400, in Reliq. Antiq. ii. 22.

BUMPKIN. This is right. We find Du. boom, '(1) a tree, (2) a barre,' Hexham; also O. Du. boomken, 'a little tree,' id.; proving that boomken was in use as the dimin. of boom.

BUN. The word occurs rather early; see bonnes, pl. buns, in Myroure of Our Lady, p. xxxiii. l. 3. Bunne, a kind of white bread; Liber Albus (Rolls ed.), iii. 423, 468, Edw. iii. anno xlvtio, i. e. A. D. 1371-2. (A. L. M.)

BUNGALOW. The Bengali word is bānglā, a thatched cottage, from Banga, i. e. Bengal; Wilson, Indian Terms, p. 59.

BUNGLE. The explanation 'to bang frequently' is correct. But the vowel u is due to the pp. of a lost strong verb *bing-en, pt. t. *bang, pp. *bung-en. Hence also O. Du. bing-el, 'a cudgill' (lit. a bang-cr), Hexham; prov. E. bang-le, a large rough stick (Halliwell); O. Du. bung-e, 'a drumme' (what is banged), Hexham. See further illustrations in Koolman's E. Fries. Dict. s. v. bingeln, büngeln.

BUNTING (2). Wedgwood strengthens his identification of bunting (the material of which flags are made) with bunt, to sift flour, by citing the F. étamine, which unites the idea of sifting flour with the above material. He cites from Tarver's Fr.-E. and E.-Fr. Dict. the following: 'Étamine, sort of woollen or silk stuff, bolting-cloth. Passer par l'étamine, to bolt, to sift. Bunting, étamine.' This is important, and may be accepted as settling the matter. We may derive bunting from the verb bunt, M. E. bonten, to sift, in the Aenbite of Inwyt, p. 93; see the Glossary. Mätzner supposes the M. E. bonten to be a mere variant of M. E. bulten, to sift, mod. E. bolt, to sift; for which see pp. 69, 786. The sb. bolting-cloth occurs before A. D. 1400; see Wright's Voc. i. 155, l. 16.

BURDEN (2). See bourdon in Littré. Perhaps we ought to separate bourdon, a droning sound, from bourdon in the sense of pilgrim's staff. If so, the view taken by Diez requires some correction.

BURLY. Not (E.), but (C.?, with E. suffix.).

BURNET, a plant. (F., -M. H. G.) A name given chiefly to the Poterium Sanguisorba and Sanguisorba officinalis; see E. D. S. Plant-Names, and Prior. Prior says the name was given to the Poterium because of its brown flowers. The flowers of the Sanguisorba are of a deep purple-brown colour. The word occurs in MS. Sloane, 2457, fol. 6 (see Halliwell) as synonymous with pimpernel, but Mr. Britten remarks that the poterium is meant. The word occurs in Low Lat. as burneta, Reliq. Antiq. i. 37, so that it is doubtless French. - O. F. brunete, given by Godefroi as the name of a flower, now unknown; but it is clearly our burnet. Also spelt brunette, and the same word with O. F. brunette, also burnette, a kind of dark brown cloth, also a brunette. See further under Brunette. ¶ The etymology in Mahn, that it is from its burning taste, is childish; for the suffix -et (which is F.) is not explained thereby.

BURNISH. Wedgwood says: 'The union of these significations [brown and polish] merits further illustration. The adj. brun, brown, was formerly used in the sense of polished, shining, as "luisanz cez espiez bruns," these bright swords shining, Chanson de Roland, 1043. [So also "s'espee d'acier brun," his sword of bright steel, id. 2080.] The E. brun must have had the same meaning when the brown bills of our yeomanry were spoken of as the national weapon; with more to the same purpose. Numerous examples may be found in O. F. and M. H. G. poetry. Brown seems to have combined the senses of 'burning,' i. e. bright, and 'burnt,' i. e. embrowned.

BUSINESS. See note on Busy (below).

BUSKIN. (Du., -F., -L., -Gk.) Sewel (1754) gives Du. brooskens, 'buskins.' This is a corruption (by the shifting of r, as in E. bird for brid, &c.) of O. Du. borseken, a little purse (Hexham); dimin. of borse, a purse (id.). This is verified by the fact that the F. brodequin, a buskin, appearing in Palsgrave and as early as in Froissart, was a corruption of the same O. Du. word, and stands for brossequin. The Du. formation is evidenced by the peculiar form of the suffix, which answers to E. -kin and G. -chen, whilst the transposition of r is manifest in the Ital. borzacchini, 'buskins, fine booties,' Florio; which seems also to be of Low G. origin as regards its suffix. As to the sense, note that Florio also gives borzacchinetti, 'little buskins, little cheuerell [kid] purses,' evidently from borsa, 'a purse, a little bag.' Cotgrave also gives F. bourson, 'a little purse, case, bag;' from bourse, a purse. β. If this be right, it is further evident that the O. Du. borse was, in its turn, borrowed from O. F. borse, a purse; see further under Purse.

γ. The E. buskin may have been borrowed from the Du. form borseken rather than brosseken, which would more easily account for the loss of the r. This is further corroborated by the O. Span. borzegui or boszegui, a buskin (Minsheu, 1623), mod. Span. borcegui. This Span. word has lost a final n, which reappears in borceguin-ero, a buskin-maker, and is represented by m in Port. borzegum, a buskin. See Palmer (Folk-Etymology), Scheler (s. v. brodequin), Diez (s. v. borzacchino). I do not observe that either Scheler or Littré mentions the important fact, that F. brodequin was once spelt with s (for d). Thus Du Guez (ab. 1532) has: 'the buskins, les brousequins;' see Palsgrave, ed. Génin, p. 907, col. 3. See also broussequin in Godefroy; and we may note that the form brosquin is still known; see Delboulle.

BUSY. The question as to the antiquity of the word business may now be set at rest. Though not given in any A. S. Dict., we nevertheless find bisignisse occurring as a gloss to Lat. solicitudinem in sect. xx. of the Table of Contents to St. Matthew's Gospel in the Lindisfarne MS. Hence business is a purely E. word, formed quite independently of O. F. busoignes, though the latter may have modified its use. We find O. F. bosoignes, wants, need, business, in the Glossary to the Liber Custumarum.

BUTT (2). Rather (F., -Low L., -Gk.). See remarks on Boot (1) above.

BUTTRESS. (F., -M. H. G.) Palsgrave has the forms bottras and butteras. The derivation from F. bouter, to thrust, is now known to be the correct one. Wedgwood rightly says: 'If Godefroy's [O. F.] Dict. had been published a little earlier, Skeat would probably not have offered this very unsatisfactory etymology [which identifies the word with brattice]. We there find bouteret, buteret (of an arch or pillar), thrusting, bearing a thrust. Et y a vi. ars bouteret en maniere de pillers qui boutent contre le siege du kannap; Inv. du Duc d'Anjou, 1360. Les ars bouteret (i. e. arcs-boutants, flying buttresses) sont mis trop haut; Reg. des délib. du Chap. de Troyes, 1362. Deux pilliers bouteret, 1358. Soubbassement avec plusieurs bouteretz, with many buttresses; 1504.' It thus appears that butress=bouterets, and is really a plural! The F. pl. suffix -ez or -ets was mistaken, in English, for the commoner F. suffix -esse, Eng. -ess. Butress is, in fact, a mistake for butrets, and the word should have been, in the singular, butret. The confusion was due to the ambiguous value of the F. z, which properly stood for ts, but was often considered as being merely a voiced s. We find the further corruption butterace, pl. butteraces, in the Will of Hen. VI.; Nichols, Royal Wills, pp. 295, 302; but at p. 303, in the same Will, buttrace is a pl. form. So also Palsgrave uses butteras as a pl. sb., where he says: 'I butteras a buyldyng, I underset it with butteras to make it stronger.'

BUTTY, a companion or partner in any work. (Scand.; or F., -Scand.) This is a prov. E. word, used in several dialects (Halliwell). A butty-gang is 'a gang of men to whom a portion of the work in the construction of railways, &c., is let, the proceeds of the work being equally divided amongst them, something extra being allowed to the head man;' Ogilvie's Dict. I make a note here that the etymology is clearly pointed out in Palsgrave, who gives: 'Botyfelowe, parsonmer, for which read parsonnier, i.e. partner. Just below he has: 'Boty, that man [read men] of warre take, butin.' Hence boty-felowe is booty-fellow, a partner or sharer in booty taken, and butty-gang is a gang of men who share equally. The shortening of the vowel oo to u is familiar to us in the words blood, flood; the use of butty for butty-fellow easily followed, when the etymology was lost sight of.

CABAL. Not (F., -Heb.), but rather (F., -L., -Heb.). The Low Lat. is cabbala (Ducange). The Heb. qabbālāh is Rabbinical Heb., not Biblical.—A. L. M.

CABRIOLET. 'Cabriolets were, in honour of his Majesty's birth-day, introduced to the public this morning;' Gent. Mag. 1823, pt. i. p. 463, under the date April 23. (But Geo. IV. was born on Aug. 12.)

CACIQUE, CAZIQUE, a W. Indian prince or chief. (Span., -W. Indian.) A name given to a chief of some W. Indian tribes. In Minshew, ed. 1627.—Span. cacique, 'an Indian prince'; Minshew, Span. Dict. (1623). From the old language of Hayti (Webster).

CAD. That this is short for cadie, has been disputed. But see the article on cadie in the larger edition of Jamieson's Dictionary. We there find 'the cadies are a fraternity who run errands,' &c. 'I had then no knowledge of the cadwys, a very useful black-guard, who go of errands; and though they are wretches, that in rags lye upon the streets at night, yet are they often considerably trusted,' &c. Cf. Northants. caddee, a servant's servant, under-waggoner (Baker). The cad of an omnibus is the conductor (not necessarily a term of reproach); see Sketches by Boz (1850), ch. xvii.

CADET. M. Paul Meyer informs me that cadet is probably a Gascon form, and that it does not represent Low Lat. capitellum, but Low Lat. capitellum, by a habit of Gascon which puts final t for final ll.

CADI, a judge. (Arab.) 'The graunde Cady;' E. Webbe, Travels (1590), ed. Arber, p. 33.—Arab. qāzī, a cadi or cazi, a judge, civil, criminal, and ecclesiastic; Rich. Dict. p. 1109; Palmer, p. 464. The third letter is ض, which Devic transliterates by d (with a dot beneath it).

β. Hence was formed (by prefixing the Arab. article al, and inserting l) the Span. alcalde, a judge, which appears occasionally in E. literature; it is spelt alcade in An Eng. Garner, vi. 14 (ab. 1586). The inserted l, says Devic, arose from an emphatic pronunciation of the Arabic ض.

CALLOW. The lost initial s appears in Swed. skallig, bald, allied to skala, to peel, from the √SKAR, to shear, as already stated. See further under Seal.

CALM. Cf. Port. calma, heat. It deserves to be added that the Low Lat. calma, heat, must have been familiarised to many by its occurrence in the Vulgate version of Job, xxx. 30.

CALTHROP, CALTRAP, a star-thistle, a ball with spikes for annoying cavalry. (L. and Teut.?) Calthrop is gen. used to denote a ball stuck with four spikes, so arranged that one of them points upwards while the other three rest on the ground. 'Caltrappe, chaussetrappe;' Palsgrave. 'Tribulus marinus, calketrappe, sea-pistel;' Reliq. Antiq. i. 37. M. E. kalketrappe, P. Plowman, C. xxi. 296. A. S. calcetrepp, star-thistle, A. S. Leechdoms, iii. 316. The most likely solution of this difficult word is to derive it from Lat. calci, crude form of calx, the heel, and a Latinised form of the Teutonic word trap. Scheler explains F. chaussetrappe from a barbarous Lat. calcitrapa, that which entraps the heel, which will equally well explain the A. S. calcetrepp. Florio gives O. Ital. calcatrippa, star-thistle, where calca is plainly supposed to be allied to calcare, to tread, the form of the Ital. word being slightly altered in order to suggest this sense. See further under Calk and Trap. The usual Ital. word for calthrop, viz. tribolo, is a totally different word, and plainly derived from tribulus, a calthrop, also a kind of thistle. We cannot possibly derive the F. -trappe in chaussetrappe from L. tribulus, which is what Mahn seems to suggest. See my note to P. Plowman, C. xxi. 296; also Catholicon Anglicum, p. 52, note 3.

CALUMET, a kind of pipe for tobacco. (F., -L.) 'Smoked the calumet, the Peace-pipe;' Longfellow, Song of Hiawatha, c. 1.—F. calumet, the stem of a herb, a pipe (Littre); a dimin. form, allied to F. chalumeau, 'the stem of an herbe, also a wheaten or oaten straw, or a pipe made thereof;' Cot. These words, like E. shawm, are derivatives from Lat. calamus; see Shawm.

CALVE. The A. S. caelfan really occurs. Mr. Sweet refers me to Ælfric's Homilies, ii. 300, last line, q. v. It is properly formed, from A. S. caelf, a calf.

CAMBRIC. The E. form is not a corruption of the F. name Cambray, but of the Flemish name of the town, viz. Kamerik. The Lat. name was Camaracum. Sewel gives 'Kameriks-doeck, chamberic (sic), lawn;' where doeck means cloth. Similarly, dornick, a kind of cloth (see Nares, and Index to the Unton Inventories) was so named from Dornick, i.e. Tournay, Lat. Tornacus.

CAMELET. Of Arabic origin; not from camel, but from Arab. khamlat, from khaml, pile, plush; Marco Polo, ed. Yule, i. 248. We find Arab. khamlat, khamalat, 'camelot, silk and camel's hair, also, all silk or velvet,' Rich. Dict. p. 628; khaml, 'the skirts or flaps of a garment, a carpet with a long pile, a cushion on a saddle, plumage of an ostrich;' ibid. Thus it appears that camel's hair was sometimes used for making it, so that confusion with camel was inevitable.

CAMPHOR. Spelt camfere in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 235 (about 1502).

CANDY. But the Arab. word may be of Aryan origin. Cf. Skt. khand, to cut or break in pieces, to bite, khanda, a piece; whence khindava, sweet-meats.

CANNEL-COAL. The word is old. 'The choicest coal in England called cannell;' R. Blome's Britannia, 1673, cited in N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 485. At the same reference the word is wrongly derived from kindle, whereas kindle is itself a derivative of candle, of which cannel is merely the prov. E. pronunciation, as already explained. In N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 18, we have a quotation for 'Canel, like Se-cole,' from Leland's Itinerary, vol. vii. fol. 59; 'The Canel, or Candle, coal;' North, Life of Lord Guildford, i. 278, 2nd ed. 1808 (Davies); Defoe, Tour through Gt. Britain, iii. 248, 4th ed. 1748 (id.).

CANON (2), a dignitary of the church. (F., -L., -Gk.) M. E. canun, Layamon, ii. 598, l. 24289; canoun, id. (later text), l. 24288.

—O. F. canone, canogne (Roquefort), more commonly canonie, chanoine (Littre, s. v. chanoine); the pl. canunie occurs in the Chanson du Roland, 3637.—Lat. canonicum, acc. of canonicus, adj., one on the church-roll or list, and so in receipt of church-funds.—Lat. canon, the church-roll or list. See Hatch, Bampton Lectures, p. 202. See Canon. N. B. The Span. cañon, a deep ravine, lit. a tube, is the same word as cañon, a cannon; see Canon.

CANT (1). The word occurs in the simple sense of 'sing' in the phr. 'cant and chirp;' Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, xiv. 356. 'To cante, to speake' is given as a cant word (with its explanation) in Harman's Caveat, p. 84. I have pointed out that many cant words came from the Netherlands; so, in this case, we may derive cant from Walloon cantier, to sing (Sigart), rather than from Lat. cantare directly.

CANT (2). The G. kante was merely borrowed from the Low G., and is not an independent word; this accounts for there being no change in the spelling (from t to z); see Weigand. See further under Canon (below).

CANTLE, a piece. (F., -Teut.) In Shak. 1 Hen. IV, iii. 1. 100. M. E. cantel, Chaucer, C. T. 3010.—O. F. cantel (mod. F. chanteau), a piece, corner, bit; see Littre, s. v. chanteau. The same as Low L. cantellus, a piece; formed with dimin. suffix -ellus from G. kante, a corner; cf. Du. kant, a border, edge, corner. See Cant (2). And see Canon.

CANTON. The problem of the relationship (if any) of Du. kant, an edge, to Lat. canthus, the tire round a wheel, is not easy. I have said, at p. 92, that they cannot be connected; but this was founded on the supposition that Du. kant was a truly Teutonic word. I would now adopt the solution given by Weigand, in his G. Etym. Dict. s. v. Kante, that the G. kante was merely borrowed from Dutch or Low German (see note on Cant (2) above); whilst the Du. word, in its turn, was likewise unoriginal, being borrowed from O. F. cant, edge, still preserved in the mod. F. phrase mettre de champ, poser de champ, to lay (bricks) edgewise; see champ (2) in Littre. These relationships once established, the word is seen to be of Romance origin; from Lat. canthus, the tire of a wheel, borrowed from Gk. κάνθος, the corner of the eye, the felloe of a wheel. Quintilian, i. 5. 88, considers it as barbarian, meaning African or Spanish, but there is nothing to shew for its being not Gk.

β. If this be the right account, the original is Gk. κάνθος, whence were borrowed Lat. canthus, and (probably) W. cant, rim. From Lat. canthus were derived O. F. cant, F. cant-on, Ital. cant-o, &c. We may mark cant (2) as (Du., -F., -Gk.); cant-ten as (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk.); cant-o as (Ital., -L., -Gk.); cant-on as (F., -Low L., -L., -Gk.); and de-cant as (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk.). Another derivative is s-cant-ling, q. v., to be marked as (F., -L., -Gk.).

CAPE (2). To be marked as (F., -Ital., -L.).

CAPERCAILLIE. Mentioned in 1618; see quotation under Ptarmigan (below), p. 823.

CAPRICE. I have been misled here by observing the entry 'rezzo, . . an agree-fit (Dante)' in Meadows' Ital. Dict. I suspect this was an old interpretation of the word in the passages to which I refer, but the right sense is 'shade.' I have also, unintentionally, somewhat mistaken Wedgwood's meaning, being thus led off the track. His suggestion is, to derive capriccio from capo, head, and riccio, curled, crisped, frizzled; the reference being to the bristling of the hair. The words raccapriccio, horror, raccapricciare, to terrify, already cited, are much to the point; the prefix rac- (it may be noted) stands for re-ac- = re-ad, as in rac-cendere, to rekindle. Capriccio would thus mean a bristling of the hair, a yearning emotion, a longing; Wedgwood cites from Altieri 'aver capriccio d'una cosa, to long for a thing, to have a fancy for it. Esser capricciosamente innamorato d'una persona, to be passionately in love with one.' Cf. s'accapriccia, shudders, Dante, Inf. 22. 31; arriar, to stand on end (as hair), id. 23. 19. β. Capo is from Lat. caput, head; riccio, bristling, is connected with riccio, a hedge-hog, from Lat. ericius, a hedgehog, lit. 'bristling animal'; see Urchin.

CAPSIZE. The Span. capuzar, mentioned at the end of the article, comes nearest to the E. form.

CAPSTAN. M. E. capstan, in Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 418. 'Post in a shype called cabastayne, cabestain;' Palsgrave. Minshew's Span. Dict. ed. 1627 gives only the form 'Cabrestante, a capston (sic) in a ship.' And he even gives 'estante, standing.' This being so, Wedgwood's etymology greatly gains in probability. He explains it as 'a standing crab [meaning windlass], a windlass set upright for the purpose of enabling a large number of men to work at it,' in opposition to the ordinary modification of the machine, where it is more convenient to make the axis horizontal. A crab is a kind of crane (see Webster), here used to translate Span. cabre (Wedgwood). I do not find cabre, but cabria means an axle-tree or crane, and cabra is a goat, or a machine for throwing stones. The F. chèvre means both a goat and a crab or crane; and it is well ascertained that cabria, cabra (like F. chèvre) are derived from Lat. capra, a she-goat; see note on Pulley, sect. γ, p. 476.

β. The etymology from capistrum is given by Mahn, but I think it must be abandoned in favour of that from capra, she-goat, and stantem, acc. of pres. pt. of stare, to stand. Let Monlau, the author of the Spanish Etymological Dictionary (2nd ed. Madrid, 1881), be heard on this point. He says of cabestante, that its origin is from Lat. capra stans, standing goat; cabra has originated the name, not of this machine only, but of those called cabreja, cabria, cabrio, &c. So also Scheler and Littré.

CARAVAN. For an early use of the word, see Hackluyt's Voyages, 1598, ii. 203, where it is spelt Carouan.

CARBOY, a large globular bottle of glass, protected by basket-work. (Arab.?) Modern; in Webster, Worcester, and Brande. — Pers. garāba, a large flagon, Palmer's Dict. col. 468; which is perhaps of Arab. origin. Cf. Pers. and Arab. qirbah, a water-skin, water-bottle, Rich. Dict. p. 1123; Palmer's Dict. col. 469.

CARK, solicitude, anxiety. (F., — L., — C.) In Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 44. M. E. cark (spelt carke), Monk of Evesham, ed. Arber, p. 78, l. 12; Cursor Mundi, l. 20790 (Northern dialect; another MS. has charge); Gamelyn, l. 760. [Somner gives A. S. carc, care, but it is wholly unauthorised; the word being really French.] The true solution of this word, never before clearly pointed out, is to be found in the Anglo-French word kark, a burden, weight, cargo, which is nothing but the Norman form of F. charge, as is also evident from the Cursor Mundi, ll. 20790, 23994, 24233. This form kark occurs in the Liber Albus, ed. H. T. Riley, p. 224; and is corroborated by the occurrence of the verb sorkarker for sorcharger in the Statutes of the Realm, vol. i. p. 26, A.D. 1275; so also descarkere, to unload, Lib. Albus (Gloss.). Hence cark meant, originally, a weight, load; but came to be used particularly of 'a load of care.' The W. carc, anxiety, solicitude, is probably the E. word borrowed; cf. Bret. karg, a load, burden (probably French); though the ultimate root is Celtic. The Low Lat. carcare, to load, occurs in the Liber Albus (iii. 380). Cark is thus a doublet of charge; see Charge. Cotgrave gives F. charge, sb., 'a load, burthen, fardle, also a charge, hindrance, or cause of extraordinary expence'; &c. I may add that we even find kark or karke, a load, in English; for in Arnold's Chron., 1502 (ed. 1811), p. 99, we find mention of 'a karke of peper' and a 'karke of gynger.' Der. cark, verb, spelt carke in Palsgrave, whence the phr. 'cark-ing care'; in the Cursor Mundi, we find 'carkid (also charkid) wit care,' ll. 23994, 24870; see also l. 24233, where another reading is charge.

CARNATION. To be marked as (F., — Ital., — L.). Littré gives carnation, but without any earlier authority than Fénelon. It was merely borrowed from Ital. carnagione.

CARNIVAL. Littré explains Low Lat. carne-levamen as 'a taking away of the flesh,' but I can find no warrant for any such extraordinary interpretation of levamen. It is true that Ducange gives carnisprivium, a deprivation of flesh, as one of the names for the days on which the faithful began their abstinence, such days beginning on the Sunday before Ash-Wednesday. But the same days were regarded by the many in quite a different light, and hence we find such Low-Latin terms as carnis-capium, a taking of flesh, and carni-vora, a devouring of flesh, applied to Shrove-Tuesday and to the carnival. I therefore incline to the opinion that carnelevamen, carniscapium, and carnivora (names for Shrove-Tuesday) all refer to feasting, and that levamen has its usual sense of 'solace.' The F. Mardi gras, lit. 'fat Tuesday,' is unambiguous.

CAROCHE, a kind of coach. (F., — Ital., — C.) Obsolete; but the present sense of carriage seems to have been brought about by confusion with it. 'The great carock,' Ben Jonson, Devil is an Ass, iv. 1 (Lady T.). Stow, in his Annals, 1615, p. 857, says that the 'ordinary use of caroches' began about A.D. 1605; Dekker, in his Seven Deadly Sinnes, 1606, ed. Arber, p. 20, mentions 'the Grand Signiors Caroach.' — F. caroche, given in Sherwood's Index to Cotgrave as a variant of carosse or carozze, 'a carosse or caroach'; Cot. Caroche is a Walloon form (Sigart). — Ital. carroccia, carrozza, 'a caroce, a coche, a chariot'; Florio. Extended from Ital. carro, 'a cart, chariot, Florio; which is of Celtic origin. See Car.'

CAROUSE. It will be noticed that the G. garau is an adverb. We find the same adverbial use in English. 'I pledge them all carouse-a;' Like Will to Like, in Hazlitt's Old Plays, iii. 339. Cf. 'And quaff carouses to thee of my blood,' id. xiv. 101. 'Carouse that bowl to me;' id. xiv. 135. W. Kemp, in 1600, was 'offered carouses' by his entertainers; Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, vii. 20.

CARRIAGE. I give the etymology under carry. I have been taken to task for not mentioning that the use of the modern E. carriage has been affected by confusion with F. carrosse, a carriage, frequently spelt caroche in old authors. It seemed to me hardly worth while to mention a fact so obvious, as I had given the reference to Trench's Select Glossary. See Caroche above.

CASSIA. Not (L., — Heb.), but (L., — Gk., — Heb.).

CAST. The orig. word for 'heap' is still better preserved in the very common Swed. dial. kas, a heap, cognate with Icel. kös, a pile, heap. See Rietz.

CASTANETS, instruments composed of two small, concave shells of ivory or hard wood, loosely fastened together by a ribbon passing over the thumb, and made to snap together by beating one of them with the middle finger. (F., — Span., — L., — Gk.) In Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674. — F. castagnettes, pl., 'finger-knackers, wherewith players make a pretty noise in some kind of dances'; Cot. — Span. castañetas, castanets; pl. of castañeta, orig. the noise made with the fingers in dancing the fandango and bolero, so called because resembling the crackling of chestnuts when roasted; cf. Span. castañetazo, the sound or crack of a chestnut which bursts in the fire. — Span. castaña, a chestnut. — Lat. castanea, the chestnut-tree. — Gk. kástravon, a chestnut; see Chestnut.

CATAMARAN. See Davies, Supplementary Glossary, where extracts are given. It seems to have sometimes meant a fire-ship, and hence a cantankerous old woman. For '(Hindustani),' read '(Hindustani—Tamil).' I have already said the word is of Tamil origin, and means 'tied logs.' I am informed that the Malayálam form of the word is kettamaram, where the derivation is easily traced; viz. from Malayálam ketta, a tie or bond, and Malayálam and Tamil maram, timber. These words are given in H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, pp. 273, 331.

CATARACT, last line. It is much better to separate πάγρυς from Lat. frango, and to refer the former to ✓ WARK (no. 355, p. 742).

CATCH. Some have said that catch must be Teutonic, because the pt. t. cauzte occurs in Layamon. Not so; for the pt. t. cauzte was merely formed by analogy with lauzte from M. E. lacchen, used with nearly the same sense as cacchen. That the word was borrowed from Picard cacher (Littré, s. v. chasser) is clear from the fact that we also find O. Du. kaetse, a chase at tennis, kaets-spel, tennis, kaets-bal = E. catch-ball; see Hexham. These are not true Dutch words, but borrowed from Picard.

CATENARY, belonging to a chain. (L.) Chiefly in the math. phr. a catenary curve, which is the curve in which a chain hangs when supported only at the ends. Formed from L. caten-a, a chain, with suffix -arius.

CATERAN, a Highland soldier or robber. (Gaelic.) In Waverley, c. xv, Sir W. Scott defines caterans as being 'robbers from the Highlands'; see also Jamieson. — Gael. ceatharnach, a soldier, fighting man; see remarks upon Kern (1) below, p. 814.

CATER-COUSIN, a remote relation, good friend. (F., — L.) 'Cater-cousin, quatre-cousin, remote relation, misapplied by Gobbo to persons who peaceably feed together; Merch. Ven. ii. 2. 139;' Schmidt, Shak. Lexicon. And see Nares. 'Quater-cosins, fourth or last cosins, good friends;' Coles (1684). Cf. 'Cater-point, in dice, the number four;' Bailey. To go diagonally across a square field is, in Surrey, to go cater-ways, or cater-ing; E. D. S. Gloss. C. 4. In all these instances, cater is from O. F. catre, four, given (with an example) by Roquefort. — Lat. quatuor, four. See Four and Cousin.

CATES, provisions. (F.,—L.) In Baret's Alveary, 1580, we find: 'A Cater, a steward, a manciple, a provider of cates, . . . qui emit opsonia.' Again: 'the Cater buyeth very dere cates;' Horman's Vulgaria. Thus the cates were the provisions bought by the cater, or, as we now say, the caterer, and were thence so called. This is better than deriving cate from O. F. acate immediately. See further under CATER. We may note that Ben Jonson uses the full form acates, Staple of News, Act i, sc. 1, l. 16.

CAVE IN. (O. Low G.) The etymology of this expression is not given in the body of the work. Wedgwood is certainly right about it. He shews that cave is here a corruption of calve (the pronunciation of cave being formerly much the same as that of the modern pronunciation of calve). 'Properly to calve in, as it is still pronounced in Lincolnshire. It is said of a steep bank of earth at which men are digging, when a portion of the wall of earth separates and falls in upon them, the falling portion being compared to a cow dropping her calf.' He then cites 'the rock calved in upon him'; N. and Q. 4 S. xii, 166; also 'Tak heed, lads, there's a cauf a-comin'; Peacock's Linc. Gloss. E. D. S. s. v. cauf. He suggests that the word was introduced by Dutch navvies (which is almost certain), and adds: 'This explanation of the expression is rendered certain by the W. Flanders inkalven, used in exactly the same sense. De gracht halft in, the ditch caves in.—De Bo, W. Flem. Dict.' More than this, the phrase occurs in E. Friesic, and Koolman cites kalven, to calve as a cow, also to fall in, as in de slotskante halft in, the brink of the ditch caves in; and further, kalveren in E. Friesic means (1) to cave in (2) to skip like a calf. See Calf.

CELANDINE. Spelt salandyne, Book of St. Albans (1486), fol. b 4, back. Halliwell explains salandyne as chalcedony, but in this passage it is the name of a herb.

CEMETERY. Spelt cemitory, Will of Hen. VI.; Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 298.

CHAGRIN. The connection between the two senses of F. chagrin is curiously exemplified in North's Examen, 1740, p. 394. He tells us that certain plotters 'take into familiarity thoughts which, before, had made their skin run into a chagrin.'

CHAIN; see Catenary (above).

CHAMPAK, a tree. (Skt.) 'The champak odours fail;' Shelley, Lines to an Indian Air, 11.—Skt. champakā, a tree, the Michelia champaka of Linnæus (Benfey).

CHAP. Cf. 'Chap (in commerce) a chapman, or customer;' Bailey, ed. 1745.

CHAPEL. I have here copied Brachet; Littré seems to take the same view. There is another theory, that capella meant a little cape, a hood, and hence a canopy, the canopy over the sacred elements (as in Diefenbach, Supp. to Ducange), and hence generally a recess in a chapel for an altar, or the chapel itself. It is a question of historical origin; it makes no difference to the etymology.

CHAPERON. The orig. use of this word as masculine is curiously illustrated by the fem. form chaperon-ess in Webster, Devil's Law Case, i. 2 (1623).

CHAR (2), l. 4. In calling chore a modern Americanism (which it is, see Miss Wetherell's novel called Queechy, ch. 25), I by no means meant to imply that it is not also an old word in English. An American reader has kindly sent me the following quotation: 'God knows how to make the devil do a good choar for a saint;' A Prospect of Divine Providence, by T. C., M.A., London, 165-, p. 379. I dare say other instances may easily be found; in fact, I have already given chevre from Beaumont and Fletcher.

CHARCOAL. Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, derives charcoal from chark, 'an old word for to burn wood (Bailey).' On the contrary, I should derive chark from charcoal, as being shortened from it. We have nothing to shew that chark is 'an old word'; whilst, on the other hand, we already find the spelling charcole, in the Prompt. Parv. (1440), Palsgrave (1530), and in the Awnturs of Arthur, st. 35 (15th cent.); also charcoill in Rauf Coilyear, l. 322, ab. 1475.

CHASTISE. See further in Mätzner. The sb. chastisement occurs in the Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 17, l. 2; and chastisinge in Gower, C. A. ii. 44.

CHATELAINE. A derivative of F. château is châtelaine, used instead of chaîne châtelaine, a chain to which keys, &c. are suspended, orig. a chain to which a warder or castellan fastened his keys. Here châtelaine is fem. of châtelain, adj.; from châtelain, sb., a keeper of a castle=Low Lat. castellanus, adj., from L. castellum, a castle.

CHECK. Not (F.,—Pers.), but (F.,—Arab.,—Pers.). Devic, in the Supp. to Littré, explains how the Pers. shâh, king, passed into the F. eschec, eschac. It was because the word was not borrowed by F. from Pers. directly, but through the medium of Arabic. [He says that the O. F. eschac represents Arab. esh-shâh, the king, where esh is for al, the definite article, l being assimilated to sh; and esh-shâh was the ejaculation used when the king was in danger, i. e. check signifies (mind) the king! This argument I reject, for the e is merely prosthetic.] A better proof that the word passed through Arabic is, that the final h of the Pers. shâh was pronounced hard by the Arabs, almost as hard g, and this gave rise to the final c of O. F. eschac.

CHEEK. The Swedish word is properly käk, with the sense of 'jaw' only.

CHEMISE. Not (F.,—L.,—Arab.), but (F.,—L.,—C.?). The Arab. gamis is not Semitic, but merely borrowed from the Lat. camisia, a word of doubtful origin. (A.L.M.) Isidore of Seville, who is not much to be depended on, connects it with cama, a bed, or couch, a word used by him only, as in the following passage: 'camisias uocari, quod in his dormimus in camis, id est stratis nostris;' Origines, 19, 22, 29 (Lewis and Short). It first appears in St. Jerome (id.). Cam-isia is certainly allied to cam-era, and to the Goth. hamon, to clothe, G. hem-d, a shirt, &c.; see Fick, iii. 64. It is probably of Celtic origin; the O. Irish form being caimmse, and the O. Welsh cammse; see Zeuss, Gramm. Celtica, 1853, ii. 749.

CHEQUE. A modern spelling of check, from a connection (which is real) with the word exchequer. For the etymology, see Check.

CHEQUER. Cf. '1 vestiment d'un drap de soye chekere ove furrore,' 1 vestment of cloth of silk chequered with fur; Will of Lady Clare (1355); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 25.

CHERT. The etymology given is illustrated by comparing Swed. dial. kart, a pebble, perhaps borrowed, like the E. word, from the Celtic. Rietz assigns no etymology for it; and it does not seem to be Teutonic.

CHERUB. Perhaps not a genuine Heb. word. It is ably discussed by Cheyne, Isaiah (1881), ii. 272, who connects kērûv with the Assyrian kirubu, a synonym for the steer-god, the winged guardian at the entrance of the Assyrian palaces. Possibly of non-Semitic and Accadian origin; see Sayce, in Encyc. Britan. s. v. Babylon.—A. L. M.

CHERVIL. Not (Gk.), but (L.,—Gk.).

CHEVERIL, kid leather. (F.,—L.) 'Cheveril, roebuck-leather, symbol of flexibility, Tw. Nt. iii. i. 13; Hen. VIII. ii. 3. 32; Romeo, ii. 4. 87;' Schmidt, Shak. Lex. 'Cheueril leather, cheuerotin;' Palsgrave. Spelt cheveril in Anglo-French; Liber Customarum, 83, 306.—O. F. chevel (mod. F. cheveau), a kid; kid leather. Dimin. of O. F. chevre, F. chèvre, fem., a goat, kid.—Lat. capram, acc. of capra, a she-goat. See Caper (1).

CHEVRON, an honourable ordinary in heraldry, in the shape of a reversed V. (F.,—L.). M. E. cheuron, Book of St. Alban's, pt. ii. fol. f 1, back. Usually said to represent two rafters of the roof of a house; I think it must, in heraldry, rather have had reference to the (gable-like) peak of a saddle, as there is nothing highly honourable in a house-roof.—F. chevron, 'a kid, a chevron in building, a rafter, or sparre'; Cot. Augmentative form of chevre, 'a she-goat,' id.—L. capra, a she-goat; see Caper (1). In the same way the Lat. capreolus meant a prop or support of timber.

CHIBOUK, a Turkish pipe, for smoking. (Turk.) Spelt chibouque, Byron, Corsair, ii. 2; Bride of Abydos, i. 8. From Turk. chibûq, a stick, tube, pipe; Devic (Supp. to Littré); chybûk, chubûk, a pipe, Zenker's Turk. Dict. p. 349.

CHICKEN. The A. S. form being cicen, not cycen, we cannot fairly explain cicen as being modified from A. S. cocc, which could only have given cycen. The right explanation is rather, that cock, chuck (a chicken) and chicken, are all from the same imitative base KUK or KIK, intended to denote the chuckling sound made by domestic fowls. See Chuck (2), and note Shakespeare's use of chuck in the sense of chicken, Macb. iii. 2. 45, and in seven other passages.

CHICORY. Not (F.,—Gk.), but (F.,—L.,—Gk.). Spelt cykorie and suckorie in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, 1539, fol. 23.

CHIDE. Cf. (perhaps) Dan. kiede, to tire, harass, weary, kied, tired; Swed. dial. keda, to make sorry. But the connection is not clear. Note that the A. S. pt. t. is not cûd, as said in most dictionaries, but cûdde, Mark, i. 25, viii. 33.

CHIGNON, an arrangement of hair at the back of the head. (F.,—L.) F. chignon, properly the back of the neck, lit. a little chain, from the projections of the vertebrae (Littré); the same word as F. chainon, der. from chaîne, chain, with suffix -on; see Chain.

CHILL. 'Chill, Du. hil, is quite different from M. E. chîle, chêl; as to the verb chill, M. E. chillen, cf. Grimm's Wörterb. v. 511; Stratmann. It is better then to put aside the M. E. chele, and to keep to chill. I have already given a reference to Trevisa, i. 51, l. 16, where we find 'for all þe chil and greet colde.' But I now observe that the usual form is not the sb., but the verb chillen, for which Stratmann gives three references besides the one which I give to P. Plowman, C. xviii. 49. This corresponds to O. Du. killen, kellen, hilden, or kelden, 'to be chill and coldish,' Hexham. Here

Mr. Sweet comes to our assistance. He observes: 'Chill is generally derived from O. E. [A. S.] cēle, which could only give *keel. But cēle = coele does not exist. The oldest texts write celi, cele, pointing to *kali. Chill comes from the West Saxon ciele, cyle;' Philolog. Soc. Proceedings, June 3, 1881. Cf. 'Frigus, ciele;' Wright's Voc. ii. 36, col. 2. See note on Cool (below).

CHIMÆRA. Ben Jonson has the pl. chimæra; Discoveries, de progressu picture.

CHIME. Wedgwood objects that, if my supposition is correct, we must extend the same explanation to the Dan. kime, to chime, and the prov. Swed. kimma, kimba, to chime, toll (Ihre); and that these words could never have been borrowed from the English. But they may all have been borrowed from Lat. cymbalum, occurring in the Vulgate version of 1 Cor. xiii. 1. Indeed, Godefroy actually cites O. F. chinbe, a cymbal. Cf. 'chyme-belle, chyme, Cimbalum,' Prompt. Parv. Wedgwood looks upon all the forms as being imitative, and even compares Gk. κύμβαλον, cymbal, with κομπεῖν, to clang or resound, contrary to the usual explanation of κύμβαλον as a dimin. of κύβος.

CHINCHONA. See Cinchona below.

CHINTZ. Not (Hind.), but (Hind., =Skt.). The Hindustani chhit, a spot, is obviously derived from Skt. chitra, spotted, variegated, orig. visible, clear; from chit, to perceive.

CHISEL. Mr. Nicol remarks that E. chisel is from North F. chisel, not from the form cisel. The etymology given (from Diez) is very forced. It seems much better (with Littré and Mr. Nicol) to take the standard form to be that seen in Ital. cesello, a chisel, answering to a Low Lat. *casellum or *casellus, from casus, pp. of cadere, to cut. Diez' sole objection seems to be that casus is a passive participle; but the Low Lat. casura meant the right of cutting trees, and the objection is of small weight. In section γ, there is a remarkable oversight; for though we certainly use the spelling scissors (proving a confusion with Lat. scindere), it is equally certain that E. scissors is a corruption of cizars, and is, in fact, nothing but a plural of chisel. See Scissors.

CHOCOLATE. For the Mexican chocolatl, see also Clavigero, Hist. of Mexico, tr. by Cullen, i. 433. Spelt jacolatl, Evelyn's Diary, Jan. 24, 1682. Introduced in England ab. 1650 (Haydn).

CHOUGE. Occurs in Chaucer, Parl. of Foules, 345.

CHOUSE. The Ital. ciaus (Florio, ed. 1611) is intermediate in form between the E. and Turkish spellings.

CHRISTMAS. The A. S. form Cristes messe occurs in the A. S. Chron. an. 1091.

CHRYSALIS. It is now doubted whether χρυσός is a genuine Aryan word. It may be Semitic. Cf. Heb. khárúts, gold, from the Heb. root khárats, to cut, dig. See Wharton, Etyma Græca; Fick (corrections), ii. 795.

CIDER. As to the derivation of F. cidre from L. sicera, all the F. etymologists are agreed. As the change from Lat. sicera to F. cidre presents a difficulty, it may be well to discuss it. Brachet's explanation, involving the forms *sistre, *sistre, is imperfect, since it will not account for the Ital. sidro. The Wallachian forms are tsighir, cigher, cighear (see Cihac's Wall. Dict. p. 294); and, according to Cihac, the Magyar form is cisger. Hence it is probable that sicera was corrupted to *sigera (cf. Ital. lagrima, tear); and that g afterwards gave place to d, just as the c (hard) gave place to t in the O. F. citre, cider, as cited by Littré. On the other hand, Diez gives O. Span. sizra, from Lat. sicera, whence (probably) Span. *sizdra (with excrement d), and finally sidra.

CIGAR. Spelt seegar in 1730; see N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 26.

CINCHONA. Not 'Peruvian,' but really 'Spanish.' Although quinine is of Peruvian origin, Cinchona is not so. The usual account is quite true. Linnæus, in 1742, named the Peruvian bark Cinchona after the countess of Chinchón; he should rather have spelt it Chinchona, but probably thought the initial ch awkward in a Latinised word, especially as the Span. ch is like E. ch in chin. The countess was cured in 1638. See A Memoir of the Lady Ana de Osorio, Countess of Chinchón and Vice-queen of Peru; by C. R. Markham, 1874. Also a note on p. 33 of Peruvian Bark, by the same author, 1880, where he says that 'quina signifies "bark" in Quichua [Peruvian], and quinquina is a bark possessing some medical property. Quinine is derived from quina, [but] chinchonine from chinchona. Spaniards corrupted the word quina into china, and in homœopathy the word china is still retained. In 1735, when M. de la Condamine visited Peru, the native name of quina-quina was almost entirely replaced by the Spanish term cascarilla, which also means bark.'

CINDER. 'Scoria, sinder;' Wright's Voc. ii. 120, col. 1 (8th century). Wedgwood seems to derive the Icel. sindr, slag, from the Icel. verb sindra, to glow; but this is a weak verb, and of course the etymology runs the other way. Sindra, to glow or sparkle like the slag in a forge, is a mere outcome of sindr, the substantive. The spelling sinder (with s) occurs as late as in Gascoigne, Works, ed. Hazlitt, i. 117, l. 30. Cf. synderys, pl., Reliq. Antiq. i. 164. We may note further that synder, in the Cath. Angl., is rendered by Lat. scoria, and in the Prompt. Parv., pp. 78, 456, by casma, or casuma (= Gk. καύσιμα, combustibles?). The word was gradually confused with F. cendres, but even now we cannot translate les cendres de nos pères by 'the cinders of our fathers.'

CINNABAR. This word seems to have been confused with sinople, q. v. It is difficult to say in every case to which word the form cinnoper belongs. Caution is therefore necessary.

CINNAMON. The Heb. qinnámón is not Semitic, but a loan-word; in Malay, it is kajú manis, sweet wood, from kajú, wood, manis, sweet. See Speaker's Commentary, Exod. xxx. 23; Gesenius, Heb. Lex. 8th ed. p. 751; Weigand, s. v. Zimmet.—A. L. M.

CIRCUIT. M. E. circuit, Chaucer, Kn. Tale, 1029; cyrcuyt, Mandeville, Trav. p. 311.

CIVIL. We find M. E. civilian, Wiclif's Works, ed. Arnold, i. 32, l. 22.

CLAN. Not (C.), but (C., = L.). The Gael. clann, Irish cland, are not Celtic words, but borrowed (like W. plant, children) from Lat. planta, a slip, scion, cutting, &c. See Plant. The facts that Irish cland = W. plant, and that both are from Lat. planta, are pointed out in Rhôs, Welsh Philology; see cland in Index.—A. L. M.

CLAP. Not (Scand.), but (E.). There is no authority for A. S. clappan. We do, however, find the sb. clappetting. 'Pulsus, clappetting;' Wright's Voc. i. 45. Also the verb clappettan, to pulsate, A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 68, l. 8. This is sufficient; we may assume a verb clappan.

CLAW. Dele section β. 'Claw is related neither to clew nor cleave; the root is to be found in Icel. klá, to claw, strong verb, pt. t. kló, pp. kleginn;' Stratmann. However, Fick (iii. 52) refers both clew and claw to the common Teut. base KLU, which he compares with Lat. gluere, to draw together (whence gluten and E. glue).

CLEAT, a piece of iron used to strengthen the soles of shoes; a piece of wood or iron to fasten ropes to. (E.) The radical sense is 'lump,' as applied to a firm and close mass. M. E. clete, a wedge, also clite or clote; Prompt. Parv. p. 81. Allied to Clot, q. v.; from a Teut. base KLUT, whence also G. kloss, a clod; allied to KLAT, whence G. klette, a bur, prov. G. klatte, entangled hair. See E. Fries. klót, a ball, klatte, a clot, discussed by Koolman.

CLEAVE (2). There may also have been an A. S. strong verb clifan, pt. t. clóf, pp. clifen, but it is extremely hard to trace it. The clearest trace seems to be in the infinitive ōclifan, Grein, ii. 305.

CLERESTORY. (F., = L.) 'And all with clere-story lyghtys;' Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. li. 'Englaidis glittering with many a clere story;' Skelton, Garland of Laurel, 479. It might as well be spelt clear story, since clere is merely the old spelling of clear. The pl. clere stories occurs in the Will of Hen. VI.; Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 303. So called because it is a story furnished with windows, rather than because 'it rises clear above the adjoining parts of the building,' as Webster has it. 'The triforium, or series of arches between the nave and clerestory are called le blyndstoris in the life of Bp. Cardmery;' Oxford Gloss. p. 57; quoted in Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, note on p. 253. See Clear and Story.

CLERGY. We may note that M. E. clergie was used in two different senses. Strictly, it had the sense of 'learning,' as still preserved in our phrase 'the benefit of clergy,' in which sense it is otherwise obsolete. This I call clergy (1). a. This clergie or clergie occurs in Rob. of Gloucester, p. 420, l. 18; and in Piers Plowman, Clergie, i. e. 'Learning,' is one of the characters introduced into the poem. It answers to O. F. clergie, 'learning, skill, science, clerkship,' Cot.; and to Low Lat. clericia, which reappears in the Ital. clericia, clerkship.

β. But clergy (2), with the usually modern sense (common in M. E., as in Rob. of Glouc. p. 563, already cited), seems at first sight equivalent to mod. F. clergé, from the Low Lat. clericatum, acc. of clericatus, orig. 'the clerical office;' Lewis and Short. γ. However, I do not hesitate to say that the Low Lat. clericia really had two senses, (1) learning, and (2) the clergy; for it is a most remarkable fact that the Span. clerecia and Port. clerezia (both obviously equivalent to clericia) are not used with the sense of 'learning' at all, but mean precisely 'the clergy,' in the mod. E. sense. Indeed, unless Littré is wrong, it would seem that O. F. clergie was occasionally so used also; for, s. v. clergie, he cites 'Toutes gens de religion, tote clergie, tout chevalier et tout gentilhomme,' where his explanation of the word as 'learning' seems to me to be out of place. So also Palsgrave has both 'Clergy, clergie;' and 'Clergy, a nombre de clerkes, clergie.' Hence both senses of clergy are from Low Lat. clericia. B. My explanation as to how the Gk. κλήρος came to mean 'the clergy' is hardly borne out by the texts cited; at any rate, the text in 1 Pet. v. 3 is not to the purpose. See Liddell and Scott; Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 246.

CLING. Cf. Swed. klänge, a tendril, a clasper; klunga, to climb. This suggests an ultimate connection with CLIMB and CLAMBER, as well as with CLUMP, as already suggested. It is clear that cramp, clump, clap, climb, clamber, all belong ultimately to a Teut. base KRAP, sometimes weakened to KLIP or KLIB; and cling (A. S. pt. t. clang) is little more than a variant from a base KLAK, allied to KLAP for KRAP.

CLOD. Cf. Swed. dial. kladd, a lump of dough, klodd, a lump of snow or clay. The particular form clod, as a variant of clot, may have been of Scand. origin. Still, there is a trace of A. S. clod in two compounds; see Bosworth.

CLOT. Cf. 'massa, cluye (sic; for cluye?), clottum;' Mone, Quellen, p. 403.

CLOTH. On the connection of A. S. cláð with Irish brat or bratt, a cloth, a cloak, see Rhys, Celtic Britain, pp. 207, 209. They are perhaps further allied to Skt. grath, to tie, granth, to tie or bind up; from a root GRAT (Fick, i. 77).

CLOVE (1). Mr. Nicol points out that the supposed derivation from Spanish is untenable. It is not (Span., - L.), but (F., - L.). It must be a modification of F. clou. We find the pl. clouys, cloves, in the Paston Letters, Nov. 5, 1471 (letter 681); cloues of gylofre, Mandeville, Trav. p. 51; also cloues, Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 99; cleues, id. p. 234; cloue, sing., Catholicon Anglicum, p. 68. Here clou = F. clou; and it is not difficult to see that the pl. clouys may have become cloues. Possibly the form cloue arose from a misreading of cloue, the form in which the F. clou was sometimes written in English.

CLOVE (2). Add: M. E. cloue, spelt 'cloue of garlek,' Prompt. Parv. p. 84. The A. S. form was prob. clufe; we only find the pl. clufe, A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 336, l. 3. Perhaps the etymology is from A. S. cluf-on, pt. t. pl. of clefan, to cleave or split off. If so, the name has reference to cleavage, and the word cannot be connected with A. S. clive or with L. globus.

* CLOVE (3), a denomination of weight. (F., - L.) A cloue of cheese is about 8 lbs.; of wool, about 7 lbs.; Phillips (1706). The word appears in the Liber Custumarum, where it is spelt clous, pl., in Anglo-French (p. 63), and claus, acc. pl., in Latin (p. 107). This gives the etymology, and shews that it is identical with cloue (1); see note on Cloue (1) above. Ducange has clavus lanae, a certain weight or quantity of wool, which he notes as being an Eng. use of the word. Clavus seems to have meant 'lump' as well as 'nail.'

CLUCK. The A. S. is cloccian; cf. A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 220, l. 18.

COACH. Not (F., - L., - Gk.), but perhaps (F., - Ital., - L., - Gk.). Spelt coche in Spenser, F. Q. i. 4. 16. I have unfortunately found the result wrongly. Diez derives F. coche, in the sense of 'boat,' from L. concha, but, in the sense of 'coach,' considers that it was merely borrowed from Ital. cocchio, which Florio (1598) explains as 'a coche, chariot.' This Ital. cocchio he supposes to be a diminutive form of cocca, a boat, which he takes to be from the Lat. concha, a shell; so that the final result is much the same as before. β. On the other hand, Littré inclines to the supposed Hungarian origin of the word, also pointed out by Diez, from Hung. kotsi. He tells us that Avila, in 1553, says of Charles V. — 'Se puso a dormir en un carro cubierto, al qual en Hungria llaman coche, el nombre y la invencion es de aquella tierra,' i. e. he laid himself to sleep in a covered car, which in Hungary they call a coach, the name and invention of it both belonging to that country; and refers us to Cabrera, i. 66. The same idea is alluded to in Beckmann's History of Inventions (London, 1846, 4th ed.), i. 77; where it is further said that the name of it was taken from that of a village in the province of Wieselburg, now called Kitsee, but formerly Kotsee. His references are to Stephanus Broderithus, speaking of the year 1526; Siegmund, baron Herberstein, in Commentario de Rebus Muscovitis, Basil, 1571, p. 145 (where the village is called Cotzi); and Bell's Appar. ad Histor. Hungariae, dec. 1, monum. 6, p. 292 (where the vehicles are called Kottschis). γ. Diez objects that the story will not account for the Ital. cocchio, an objection which is of great weight. Cihac, in his Wallachian Dict., 1870, p. 109, adopts Diez's view, and supposes the Wallachian coche, a coach, to be related to Wall. gkioaca, a shell, the latter being a derivative of Lat. coelea or cochlea. He gives the following forms: Ital. cocchio, Span. and Port. coche, F. coche, E. coach, G. kutsche, Little Russ. kočija, Servian kočije, Pol. kocy, Hung. kocsi, Alban. kotsi, Wallach. cocie. I may add that Nares, in his Glossary, s. v. Caroch, remarks that 'coaches are said to have been first brought into England in 1564, by William Boonen, a Dutchman, who became coachman to Queen Elizabeth.' The Du. koets, which he cites, is merely a Du. spelling of F. coche. The village of Kitsee is near Raab (Weigand).

COARSE. An earlier example occurs in the phrase 'curse wadmoll,' i. e. coarse wadmoll, in Arnold's Chronicle (about 1502), ed. 1811, p. 236. See Wad, l. 11. Cf. also 'homely and course cloth;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, b. i. Aristippus, § 4.

COCHINEAL. It should be added that the ch in Span. cochinilla presents no difficulty to the etymology from coccineus. Diez (Gramm. i. 364) instances Span. chancha = Ital. ciancia, facha = Ital. faccia, charla = Ital. ciarlare. In the Span. Etym. Dict. by Monlau (1881), it is explained that the Span. cochinilla, a wood-louse or 'sow-bug,' dimin. of cochina, a pig, is a distinct word from cochinilla, cochineal, derived from Lat. coccineus. For an early mention of cochineal, see Eng. Garner, vi. 14; also id. v. 60.

COCK (1). Not (F., - L., - Gk.), but (E.). The A. S. coc or cocc is not borrowed from F. cog, but occurs early; see Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Pastoral Care, c. 63, ed. Sweet, p. 459; and see Matt. xxvi. 74. The fact is, that the word is of imitative origin, and therefore appears in the same form in E., F., and Gk. Cf. the extract from Chaucer, already given; also the note on Chicken (above).

COCKLE (1). We find A. S. sæ-coccas, acc. pl., sea-cockles, in Ælfric's Colloquy (Piscator). The word is, however, borrowed from Celtic.

COCKNEY. The W. coeginaidd, being accented on the penultimate, can hardly be compared with M. E. cokeney. But M. E. cockney answers precisely to a F. coquiné = Low L. *coquinatus, and I suspect that Mr. Wedgwood has practically solved this word by suggesting to me that it is founded on L. coquina, a kitchen. We might imagine *coquinatus to have meant, as a term of reproach, a vagabond who hung about a kitchen of a large mansion for the sake of what he could get to eat, or a child brought up in the kitchen among servants. We may particularly note F. coquineau, 'a scoundrell, base varlet,' Cot.; coquiner, 'to begge, to play the rogue;' coquinerie, 'beggery;' coquin, 'a beggar, poor sneak.' This suggests that the F. coquin is connected with L. coquus, as to which Littré and Scheler seem agreed. I think we are now certainly on the right track, and may mark the word as (F., - L.). I would also suggest that the F. coquin, sb., was really due to the verb coquiner, which answers to Low L. coquinare, to cook, i. e. to serve in a kitchen. The transition in sense from 'serve in a kitchen' to 'beg in a kitchen,' is very slight, and answers only too well to what we know of human nature, and the filching habits of the lowest class of scullions, &c. Coquinatus might mean 'attached to a kitchen,' without much violence being done to the word. Cf. F. gueux from L. coquus (Scheler).

* COCKROACH, a kind of beetle. (Span., - L., - Gk.) 'Cockroches, a kind of insect;' Phillips, ed. 1706. 'Without question, it is from the Portuguese caroucha, chafer, beetle, and was introduced into our language by sailors;' F. Hall, Modern English, 1873, p. 128. But a friend kindly points out that the E. word is borrowed, not from Port. caroucha, but from Span. cucaracha, 'a wood-louse, a kind of centipede, blatta or short-legged beetle, common aboard of American ships, a cockroach, Blatta americana, L.;' Neuman. I think the Port. caroucha is merely a clipped form of the same word, with loss of the first syllable. The etymology of cucaracha is obscure; perhaps the sense 'wood-louse' points to Lat. coccum, a berry, from Gk. κόκκος, a kernel, a berry, a pill; from the shape of the rolled-up wood-louse. Cf. Span. cuco, a sort of caterpillar, coco, a worm or grub; words of obscure origin.

CODDLE. I have given what I believe to be the right explanation of the passage in Philaster. But the extension of the meaning to 'cockering' or 'pampering' has prob. been influenced by prov. E. caddle, to caress, fondle, coax (Leicestersh. Gloss., by Evans, E. D. S.); or the words have been confused. Caddle is precisely F. cadeler, 'to cocker, pamper, make much of,' Cot. = O. F. cadel, 'a casting, a starveling, &c., one that hath need much of cockering and pampering;' Cot. = Lat. catellus, a whelp (precisely as O. F. cadel, F. cadeau, is from catellus in the sense of 'little chain'). Dimin. of Lat. catulus, a whelp, which is the dimin. of catus, a cat. See Cat.

CODICIL. Perhaps (F., - L.). I find codicell in the Will of Lady Margaret (1508); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 365. Cotgrave has F. codicile, 'a codicil, scedule.'

CODLING (2). Mr. Palmer calls attention to 'Querdyngge, apple, Duracenum;' Prompt. Parv. p. 420. Cf. duracinus, hard-berried, hard (of fruits); Lewis and Short. The connection is doubtful; Palsgrave explains 'Codlyng, frute,' by 'pomme cuite.'

COFFEE. 'He [a Greek] was the first I ever saw drink coffee, which custom came not into England till 30 years after;' Evelyn's Diary, May 10, 1637.

COIF. Not (F., - M. H. G.), but (F., - M. H. G., - L.). It has already been pointed out that the G. word is borrowed from Latin. The M. H. G. kupfe, a cap, answers to Low Lat. cuppa, whilst M. H. G. kopf, koph, answers to Low Lat. coppa, copa. Cuppa, coppa, copa are variants of Lat. cupa, a tub, vat; see Cup. Ducange also gives Low Lat. copha, cofia, cuphia, a cup, a coif; these are merely Latinised forms of the M.H.G. words. We may notice quives as a curious form of the pl. of quoif, by-form of coif; see N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 74.

COISTREL, COYSTRIL, a mean paltry fellow. (F., -L.) In Shak. Tw. N. i. 3. 43; Per. iv. 6. 176. Put for coustrel, which was the older form. 'Coustrell, that wayteth on a speare, coustellier;' Palsgrave. From this evidence we may also infer that coustrell was an E. adaptation of the F. word coustellier or coustillier, probably formed by the dropping of the last syllable and insertion of r after t (as in cart-ridge). - F. coustillier, 'an esquire of the body, an armour-bearer unto a knight, the servant of a man-at-arms [which explains Palsgrave's definition]; also a groom of a stable, a horse-keeper;' Cotgrave. The use of the word in the sense of 'paltry fellow' is precisely parallel to the similar use of groom, lackey, hind, &c. The lit. sense is one who carries a poniard. - F. coustille, 'a kind of long poniard, used heretofore by esquires;' Cot. Variant of O. F. coustel, spelt cousteau in Cotgrave, 'a knife, or whittle, a sword, or any such cutting weapon.' The s is unoriginal; the proper O. F. spelling is coutel or cotel, also cuteil. - Lat. cuteillus, a knife; see Cutler, Cutlass. The Low Lat. form of coistrel is cuteiliarius, a soldier armed with a cutlass (Ducange).

COITION, a meeting together, copulation. (L.) Used by Sir T. Browne of the meeting together of magnetised substances; Vulgar Errors, bk. ii. c. 2. § 8. - Lat. acc. coitionem, a meeting together. - Lat. coitus, pp. of coire, to come together. - Lat. co- (for cum), together; ire, to go, come.

COLLIE, COLLY, a kind of shepherd's dog. (C.) 'Coaly, Coley, a cur dog;' Brockett's Glossary of N. Eng. Words, 1825. Shepherd-dogs 'in the N. of England are called coally dogs;' Recreations in Nat. History, London, 1815. - Gael. cuilean, cuilein, a whelp, puppy, cub; Irish cuileann, a whelp, a kitten. Perhaps from Irish and Gael. cu, a dog.

COLONEL. 'Hee was . . . coronell of the footemen, thowghe that tearme in those dayes unuzed;' Life of Lord Grey (Camden Soc.), p. 1; written A.D. 1575, and referring to 1544.

COLZA OIL, a lamp-oil made from the seeds of a variety of cabbage. (F., -L. and Du.) See Webster and Loudon; colza means 'cabbage-seed,' and should not be used of the cabbage itself. - F. colza, better spelt colzat, as in Richelet; borrowed from the Walloon colza, golza, Rouchi colsa. - Du. koolzaad, rape-seed, cole-seed, lit. cabbage-seed. - Du. kool, cabbage; zaad, seed (Littre). The Du. kool is not a Teut. word, but borrowed from Lat. caulis; Du. zaad is cognate with E. seed. See Cole and Seed.

COMB (2), COOMB, a measure. (Low L., - Gk.) The A.S. cumb is, I find, not a fictitious word, but occurs in the sense of 'cup' or 'vessel' in A.S. Leechdoms, iii. 28, l. 9; and again, in the sense of 'coomb' or vessel of certain capacity, in Thorpe, Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, p. 40, l. 5. It is the same as Du. kom, 'a hollow vessel or dish to put meat in;' Hexham; G. kumpf, a hollow vessel, a trough. Not a Teutonic word, but borrowed from Low L. cumba, a tomb of stone (i.e. a stone trough, and doubtless also used in other senses), which is merely a Latinised form of Gk. κύβη, a drinking vessel, hollow cup, bowl, boat; cf. κύβος, a hollow vessel, cup, basin. This is nothing but a nasalised form of cup; see further under Cup and Cymbal. The article, at p. 123, is completely wrong in every way, which I regret.

COMBUSTION. Otherwise, Lat. com-burere is from a form *burere = *purere, allied to pruna; see Freeze, p. 219. (Fick, i. 680.)

COMFREY, the name of a plant. (F., - L.) Spelt comfery, Book of St. Albans, fol. c 6, back, l. 1; confery in the 14th cent., Reliquie Antiquæ, i. 55. (See also comfrey in Britten and Holland's Plant-Names.) - O. F. cumfrie; we find 'cumfria, cumfrie, galloc,' in a vocab. of the 13th cent., in Wright's Vocab., i. 139, col. 1. Here cumfrie is the O. F. name, galloc the A.S. name, and cumfria, the Low Lat. name; the last appears to be merely the O. F. name Latinised. By an extraordinary confusion between the written f and long s, we actually find the F. form consire in Cotgrave, explained as 'the herbe comfrey.' [The mod. F. name is consoude (cf. Span. consuelida, Ital. consolida), derived from Lat. consolidare, from its supposed healing powers.] β. The O. F. cumfrie appears to be a corruption of Low Lat. confirma, comfrey. We find 'confirma, galluc,' in the Durham Glossary, pr. in Cockayne's Leechdoms, ii. 301; and at p. 162 of vol. i. we learn that the plant was called confirma or galluc. Halliwell gives 'galloc, comfrey.' [Perhaps the change from confirma to cumfrie was due to some confusion with F. confire (Lat. conficere), 'to preserve, confect, soak, or steep in;' Cotgrave.] If this be right, the derivation is from Lat. confirmare, to strengthen, from its healing powers; see Cockayne's Leechdoms, i. pref. p. liii, and cf. the Gk. name συμφορον. See Confirm.

COMPLOT. See Plot (1), p. 440; and note on Plot (1) below.

CONSECRATE. The word consecrat = consecrated, occurs in Chaucer, C. T. Group B, l. 3207 (Samson).

CONSTABLE, l. 6. For conestabulus, read conestabulum; the document quoted is the Chronicon Reginonis abbatis Prumiensis, died A.D. 915; at the year 807.

CONSTIPATE. But I find the verb constipate also, in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, 1539, fol. 17 b; the sb. pl. constipations occurs on fol. 63.

CONTRAST. The sb. seems to have been first introduced, and the orig. sense was 'a dispute,' answering to F. contraste, 'with-standing, strife, contention, difference, repugnance;' Cot. Daniel has 'contrast and trouble;' Hist. of Eng. p. 26 (1618). Howell (Letters, vol. i. sect. 6. let. 8) has contrasto, from Ital. contrasto, explained as 'strife' by Florio. See Davies, Supp. Glossary.

CONTRIVE. Not (F., -L.), but (F., -L. and Gk.). Dele l. 9, about the derivation of O. F. trover. The right derivation is given under Trover. The hint came to me from a note (doubtless by Mr. Nicol) in The Academy, Nov. 9, 1878, p. 457; 'we may note G. Paris's satisfactory etymology of trouver = tropare (from tropus, a song), instead of F. turbare, which presents phonetic difficulties, and does not explain troubadour.'

CONTROL. We find the Anglo-French countre-rolleur, controller, in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 133, an. 1299; and the sb. pl. countre-roules, counter-rolls, in the same, i. 29, an. 1275. In P. Plowman, C. xii. 298, where one MS. has counteroller, another has countrollour.

CONUNDRUM. 'I must have my crotchets! And my conundrums!' Ben Jonson, The Fox, Act v. sc. 7. It here means a conceit, device. 'I begin To have strange conundrums in my head;' Massinger, Bondman, Act ii. sc. 3. Again, in Ben Jonson's Masque, called News from the New World, Fact says: 'And I have hope to erect a staple of news ere long, whither all shall be brought, and thence again vented under the name of Staple News, and not trusted to your printed conundrums of the Serpent in Sussex, or the witches bidding the devil to dinner at Derby; news that, when a man sends them down to the shires where they are said to be done, were never there to be found.' Here conundrum means a hoax or a canard. In Ram Alley, iii. 1. 2 (Hazlitt's Old Plays, x. 313) we find: 'We old men have our crotchets, our conundrums, Our figaries, quirks, and quibbles, As well as youth.' The etymology seems hopeless; as a guess, I can imagine it to be a corruption of Lat. conandum, a thing to be attempted, a problem; somewhat as quillet is a corruption of quidlibet. It might thus be an old term of the schools. For the later sense, see Spectator, no. 61, May 10, 1711.

CONY, CONEY. It seems best to regard this as derived from the French and to mark it (F., -L.). Weigand regards the G. forms as merely borrowed from the Romance languages; cf. Ital. coniglio, Span. conejo, Port. coelho. The best proof of its F. origin is its occurrence in Anglo-French; the forms conil, conyng occur in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 380 (A.D. 1363); conyn in the Liber Custumarum, p. 305; whilst the pl. conis occurs much earlier, in the Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 139. The O. F. connil was sometimes corrupted to connin (as in Palsgrave), whence the G. kanin-chen. Connil is from Lat. coniculus, said to be a word of Spanish origin; in which case the Gk. κύνικλος must have been borrowed from Latin. The proposed etymology from ✓SKAN is given by Fick, as cited.

COOL. Note particularly the Icel. strong verb kala, to freeze, pt. t. kól, pp. kalinn. The adj. cool is from the pt. tense. The A.S. celi, cold, sb., is clearly from the same strong verb. See note to Chill (above).

COOLIE, COOLY. 'Tamil kúli, daily hire or wages, a day-labourer, a cooly; the word is originally Tamil, whence it has spread into the other languages [Malayálim, Telugu, Bengáli, Kárnáta]; in Upper India, it bears only its second and apparently subsidiary meaning;' H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 301.

CO-PARCENER, a co-partner. See Partner, p. 423. We find Anglo-French parcener, parcenerie, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 155; parceners, pl., id. 45; Stat. Realm, i. 49, an. 1278; Annals of Burton, pp. 471, 480. Also parcenerie, partnership, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 45.

COPE (1). An earlier example of the word is the A.S. 'cóp, endeton,' in Wright's Vocab. i. 59, col. 2.

CORBAN. The Heb. qorbán is from Heb. root qárav, to draw near, to offer. Similarly the Arab. qurbán, a sacrifice, oblation, is allied to qirbán, qurbán, an approaching, drawing near, from the Arab. root gariba, he drew near; Rich. Dict. p. 1123.

CORBEL. 'Chemynceis, corbels, &c.; Arnold's Chronicle, 1502 (ed. 1811), p. 138.

CORNELIAN. M. E. corneline, Mandeville, Trav. p. 275.

CORONER. The first appearance of Anglo-F. coroner is in A.D. 1275, Stat. of the Realm, i. 29; spelt coruner, id. i. 28. This is long before its appearance in the spurious charter mentioned at p. 135.

CORROBORATE. Already used as a vb., with the lit. sense 'strengthen,' in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, 1539, fol. 22.

COSTERMONGER. As to the etymology of costard, an apple, I find an excellent suggestion in R. Hogg's Fruit Manual, 4th ed. p. 38. He says: 'The costard is one of our oldest English apples. It is mentioned under the name of "Poma Costard" in the fruiterer's bills of Edw. I, in 1292, at which time it was sold for a shilling a hundred. . . Is it not . . . probable that it is derived from costatus (Anglicé costate, or ribbed), on account of the prominent ribs or angles on its sides?' This idea, as given by a man of practical experience, is worth having, and needs but slight modification. We may, accordingly, derive costard from O. F. coste, a rib (= Lat. costum), with the usual O. F. suffix -ard (= O. H. G. -hart), as in drunk-ard, &c.; and we may explain it as 'the ribbed apple.' The jocular use of costard (as in Shakespeare) in the sense of 'head,' is secondary, and not (as Johnson supposed) original; the name being applied to the head from its roundness, just as it is called a nob (i. e. knob). Mr. Hogg also notes that costermonger = costard-monger; which no one doubts.

COSTIVE, adj. 'Mahn and E. Müller suggest Ital. costipativo, or Span. constipativo (which, however, mean "constipating," "constriuctive," not "constipated") as the immediate origin of this word; Prof. Skeat rightly thinks F. constipé more probable (or, rather, less improbable). His remark, s. v. cost, that F. coster is from L. constare, gives the key to the problem. It is, indeed, obvious that the only language in which Lat. constipatum would have given a form closely resembling E. costive is F., where it would become costevé, the Mod. F. constipé being of course a learned word. The loss of the final -é of costevé in E. has numerous parallels, as trove (in treasure trove) from trové, prepense (in malice prepense) from purpensée, square from esquarré; and the syllable -ev is so like the common termination -ive (or rather Mid. E. -if), that its assimilation to this was almost unavoidable. I had, therefore, no hesitation in assuming the existence of a non-recorded O. F. costevé as the source of E. costive; and I have since found a 14th century example of the O. F. word in Littre (under the verb costiper), in the plural form costevéz. The E. example given by Mr. Skeat, and presumably about the earliest he had, is from Ben Jonson; but I suppose Richardson's quotation from Drant (whose exact date I do not know) is a little older. The word must have been Mid. E., though the earliest instance I know is in Palsgrave (1530), who spells it with the Mid. E. f, and after clearly explaining "Costlyfe, as a person is that is no[t] laxe or soluble," mistranslates it by F. cousten-geneux, which meant "costly." A phonetic feature which I cannot well account for, in the words cost and costive, is that they have ð, instead of v; as the O. F. vowel comes from Lat. ō (constāre, constipatum), and gives u (spelt ou) in Mod. F. couïer, we should have expected u, just as in custom, Mod. F. coutume (costume is Italian) from cōsumētumina (Class. Lat. -tudinem).—H. Nicol.

COSY, COZY, snug, comfortably sheltered. (C. ?) This word appears to have been introduced from Lowl. Scotch. We find: 'cosie in a hoord,' Ramsay's Poems, i. 305 (Jamieson); and 'cozie i' the neuk,' Burns, Holy Fair, st. 20. It seems to be from Gael. cosach, abounding in hollows, recesses, or crevices, cosagach, (1) full of holes or crevices (2) snug, warm, sheltered.—Gael. cos, a hollow, crevice, cavern, hole. Cf. Irish cos, a fissure, cuas, a cave; and perhaps Gk. κόρη, a hole. Thus the sense is 'sheltered,' from the notion of being snugly coiled up in a hole; which is just the way in which Burns uses it. ¶ Derived by Mahn from F. causer, to talk (from Lat. causari), which is incompatible with its adjectival use and form. But of course Miss Austen was thinking of F. causer when she wrote of having 'a comfortable coze,' i. e. talk; Mansfield Park, ch. xxvi. (Davies). On the other hand, cf. Sc. cosh, snug; and cosh, adj. having a hollow beneath (Jamieson).

COT. The right A. S. forms are cote and cyte. We also find Icel. kyta, kytra, Swed. dial. käta, a cot, cottage. The common orig. Teut. form is KOTA, a cot; Fick, iii. 47.

COTTON (1). Not (F.,—Arab.), but (F.,—Span.,—Arab.).

COTTON (2), 1. 2. For 'W. cytenu,' read 'W. cytuno.' We also find W. cytun, of one accord, unanimous; cytlyn, accordant, cytynnu, to pull together, concur. Cf. W. cy, together; tynu, to pull. For examples of the word, see 'If this gear cotten,' in Stanyhurst, tr. of Virgil, b. i., ed. Arber, p. 19, l. 8; also, 'John a Style and I cannot cotton,' Play of Stucley (ab. 1598), l. 290, pr. in Simpson's School of Shakespeare, i. 169. The verb cytuno is, however, accented on the u, but the adj. on the y. This etymology must be regarded as only a guess, in which I have not much confidence.

⚭ COURTESAN. It is actually used in the old sense of 'belonging to a court.' We find: 'Maister Robert Sutton, a courtezane of the Court of Rome;' Paston Letters (let. 7), i. 24.

COVIN, secret agreement, fraud; a law-term. (F.,—L.) The Anglo-French covine occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 162, an. 1311. The M. E. covine, covin, counsel, trick, sleight, is a common word, occurring, e. g. in Chaucer, C. T. 606 (or 604).—O. F. covine, covaine, secret agreement (Burguy).—O. F. covenir (F. convenir), to assemble, agree.—Lat. convenire, to come together; see Covenant, Convene. Thus covin = convention.

COWARD. The hare is called 'the coward with the short tayle,' and 'la cowarde ou la court cowe' in the Book of St. Albans (1486), fol. e 5, back; also cowart, as early as the time of Edw. I.; Reliq. Antiq. i. 134. We also find the Anglo-French cuard, a coward, in Gaimar's Chron. l. 5619; spelt coward, Langtoft's Chron. i. 194; see also the Vows of the Heron, in Wright's Polit. Poems, i. 5.

COWL (1). 'I should think all the words cited must have been borrowed from L. cucullus, as certainly the Irish cochal (a cowl) was. Doubtless an ecclesiastical word. The Icel. kufi looks as if it had come through the Irish cochal, the ch becoming f, as in E. laugh.—A. L. Mayhew. A more probable solution is that Icel. kufi is borrowed (like other ecclesiastical terms) from A. S. cufle, and that A. S. cufle was borrowed from the ancient British form of L. cucullus. In either case, cowl is not E., but L.

COWRY. In H. H. Wilson's Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 271, he gives the Hindi form as kauri, corruptly called cowry or courie; Bengali kari, Guzerathi kori; explained as a small shell used as coin. Four kauris = 1 ganda, and 80 kauris = 1 pan.

COWSLIP. The M. E. form is actually cosloppe; Wright's Voc. i. 162, l. 9; cowslap, Prompt. Parv. Cf. Swed. oxlågga, a cowslip. The right division of the A. S. word is beyond all doubt; it is written cū sylppan, acc. (as two words) in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 326; whilst in the same, iii. 30, we have the acc. cuslyppan and oxsanslyppan, where oxsanslyppan is compounded of oxsan (for oxan), gen. of osa, and slyppan, acc. of slyppa, lit. a slip. It cannot be held that slyppa means 'a lip'!

CRACK. Particularly note the gloss: 'crepante, craciendum, cearciendum;' Mone, Quellen, p. 331. Also: 'sió corpe eall cracode,' the earth all cracked; A. S. Psalter, ed. Thorpe, Ps. xlv. 3.

CRAM. There was certainly an A. S. strong verb crimman, pt. t. cramm, pp. crummen. The pp. occurs; for I find 'Farsa, acrummen;' Wright's Voc. ii. 35, col. 1. Also 'Farcire, acrymman,' id. 37, col. 2; where acrymman is probably merely a misspelling for acrimman, as the gloss is only of the 11th century. Cf. crumb.

CRAMP. Cf. M. E. crempen, vb. to restrain, Owl and Nightingale, l. 1788. A weak verb.

CRANE. Both crane and krane occur, in the sense of weight-lifting machine, in Arnold's Chron. 1502 (ed. 1811), p. 127. Palsgrave has: 'crane of a wharfe, grue;' and Cotgrave has: 'grue, a crane, also the engine so called.'

CRAVAT. We even find Cravat used in the sense of Croat or Croatian in English. 'Horsemen armed, like the German Cravats, with long lances;' Lord Nugent, Life of Hampden; see N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 113.

CRAVEN, adj. 'Mr. Skeat, agreeing with Mahn, derives this word from E. crave, but, unlike him, adds that it was a translation or accommodation of Mid. E. creaunt for recreaunt, O. F. recreant; Mätzner and E. Müller simply identify it with creaunt. Mr. Skeat says that the Mid. E. word was really cravand, the Northern participle of crave, and supports this by the forms cravant in the St. Katharine of about 1200, and crauaunde in the 15th century Morte Arthur. But neither -ant with t, nor -aunde with au, is the ending of the Northern participle; on the contrary, they point clearly to O. F. ant with nasal a. The meaning, too, does not suit; craven originally did not mean "begging quarter," "suing for mercy," as Mr. Skeat says, but "conquered," "overcome"—al ha encouen ham cravant and overcumen is the phrase in St. Katharine. The sense of creaunt (for recreaunt) agrees fairly with that of craven; the form, however, is very unsatisfactory. The hypothesis of assimilation to North E. cravand is inadmissible, as cravand and cravant (or crauaund) are, as just shown, distinct in Mid. E. both in sense and form; and as the O. F. recreant, corresponding to a Lat. form recredātem, never shows a for its second e, nor v between e and a, cravant cannot come from it. There can, I think, be little doubt that cravant is the O. F. participle cravanté, or perhaps rather its compound acravanté, with the frequent Mid. E. loss of final -é (mentioned before, in treating of costive). As this O. F. word corresponds to a Lat. crepānter, its primitive form, which is not uncommon, was clearly crevanter with e (as in Span. quebrantar, and in F. crever from the simple crepāre); but the form with a in the first syllable, though anomalous, is at least as common, and is the only one in the Roland (which, unlike most texts, has e in the second syllable—craventer). The meaning of the O. F. word, originally "to break," agrees as exactly as its form with that of the Mid. E. word. We have in the Chanson de Roland, l. 3549, "he strikes him who carries the dragon (flag), so that he overthrows both"—craventet ambur, and Philippe de Thauin [Bestiary, l. 248] uses diable cravantad to express that Christ, after his crucifixion, overcame the devil.—H. Nicol. Further examples of the Anglo-French forms are cravaunier, to overthrow, Langtoft's Chron. l. 394; cravaunite, pp. id. 406, 484 (and see p. 298). There can be no longer any doubt as to the etymology of this word.

CREATE. We find the form create used as a pt. t. as early as 1482; see Warkworth's Chron. ed. Halliwell (Camd. Soc.), p. 1, l. 4.

CREW. (F., = L.) The etymology of this word, hitherto always wrongly given, has been discovered by Dr. Murray. He finds that it is really a clipped form of accrue, accrue, or acree, used in the 16th century to signify (1) a reinforcement, (2) a company sent on an expedition, (3) a company, a crew. Accrue was turned into a crew, in which a was supposed to be the indef. article. In Holinshed's Chron., an. 1554, we are told that 'the towne of Calis and the forts were not supplied with any new *accrue*s of soldiers,' and so were lost to the English. Fabyan says that 'the French kynge sent soone after into Scotlande a crewe [auxiliary force] of Frenshemen,' vol. ii., fol. 98 (ed. Ellis, p. 444); and, again, speaks of 'a crewe of Englysshemen,' fol. 166 (p. 286). This being once ascertained, the etymology presents little difficulty. Accrue answers to F. accrue, 'a growth, increase, eeking, augmentation,' orig. the fem. of accru, 'growne, increased,' Cotgrave. Accru is the pp. of accroistre, to increase, mod. F. accroître; see Accrue. Littré cites 'accru de leurs soldats,' i.e. recruited by their soldiers; see Recruit, which is a closely allied word. Thus crew is really 'a recruiting,' a band of men sent in aid; hence, a band of men generally.

* CREWEL, worsted yarn slackly twisted. (Du.?) In King Lear, ii. 4. 7. Halliwell explains it by 'fine worsted, formerly much in use for fringe, garters, &c.' The Whitby Gloss. has 'creeds or crules, coloured worsteds for ornamental needle-work, &c.' Palsgrave has: 'Caddas or crule, sayette.' The mod. spelling is misleading; the old spelling crule renders it probable that the word is from Du. krul, a curl; cf. krullen, to curl, krullig, curly. Cf. Du. krullen van hout, 'shavings of wood'; krullen, 'to curl, crisp, wind, turn'; Sewel. If this be right, the reference is to the twisted form of the yarn; cf. Bailey's definition of crewel as 'two-twisted worsted.' See Curl. ¶ Mr. Wedgwood says 'properly a ball of worsted'; but I can find no authority for this.

CRICKET (2). Wedgwood suggests that cricket, as the name of a game, is due to the prov. E. cricket, a stool, and that the name of the bat used for the game was not cricket, but cricket-staff, as in the quotation which I give from Cotgrave at p. 142. Cricket is explained by Miss Baker (Northampton. Glos.) as 'a low, four-legged stool,' and she refers us to Leland, Collectanea, i. 76. The probability that this suggestion is the right one is much increased by remembering that cricket was, in all probability, a development of the older game of stool-ball, mentioned in the Two Noble Kinsmen, v. 2; see stool-ball in Halliwell. The stool, such as was used by dairy-maids, seems to have been used as a wicket (see Johnson); and the game was popular with girls. If this be so, cricket really represents the wicket, not the bat.

β. But it makes little ultimate difference to the etymology; cricket, in the sense of stool, answers to Low G. kruk-stool in the Bremen Wörterbuch, allied to Low G. krukke, a crutch. Cf. also O. Du. krick, kricke, krukke, a crutch, or a leaning-staff (Hexham); Du. kruk, a crutch, also a perch. Whether the cricket was named as being a support, or from its crooked legs (bent outwards, not perpendicular), we may still connect it with crutch and A.S. crice. Palsgrave has: 'Cricke, to bende a crosbowe with;' where it plainly means a hooked stick used in drawing up the string of a cross-bow.

CRIMSON, l. 5. The O. F. cramoisyne occurs in the 16th century (Littré).

* CRINGLE, an iron ring strapped to the bolt-rope of a sail. (Scand.) 'Cringle, a kind of wrethe or ring wrought into a rope for the convenience of fastening another rope to it;' Ash's Dict., ed. 1775. Prob. a Northern E. word, of considerable antiquity.—Icel. kringla, a circle, orb, disk (hence, simply a circle or ring); cf. kringlóttir, circular, kringar, pl., the pulleys of a drag-net (whence the E. sense). Allied to kring, adv., around, kringja, to encircle, surround; Swed. kring, prep., around about; Du. kring, a circle, circuit, orb, sphere. Allied to Crinkle, Cringe, and Crank (1).

CRIPPLE. The dat. cryple actually occurs in the Northumbrian version of Luke v. 24, as a gloss to Lat. paralytico. We also find A. S. creðpere, a cripple, lit. 'a creeper'; this form occurs in St. Swithun, ed. Earle, p. 12, l. 17.

CRONE. The pronunciation of the Celtic words mentioned is too unlike the English. Wedgwood points out a far better suggestion. Crone is also used in the sense of an old ewe, as in Tusser's Husbandrie, § 12, st. 4 (E. D. S.); this reminds him of O. Du. kronie, variant of karonie, an old sheep (both given in Hexham). This Du. word is a mere borrowing from the Picard carone, answering to F. charogne (E. carion); see Littré. Probably the E. crone was borrowed from the Picard dialect likewise; the form carion (with its hard c) is also a Norman form, occurring in Anglo-French as caruine, in the Bestiary of Philip de Thauin, l. 1293. I believe this to be right, and that crone and carion are doublets, with a difference of accent as in chânel and canal, faculté and facility. The sense of 'old carcase,' though not complimentary, is intelligible. Moreover, we thus explain the word crony also, which is the O. Du. kronie almost unaltered. It originally meant an old woman, as in 'marry not an old crony,' in Burton (cited by Worcester); hence, a gossip, &c.

* CROQUET, a game with mallets, balls, posts, and hoops. (F.) Noticed in N. and Q. 3 S. iv. 349, 439, v. 494 (1863, 1864). To croquet a ball is to drive it away by a smart tap upon another ball placed in contact with it; and hence the name. The spelling is the same as that of F. croquet, a crisp biscuit, so named from its being crunched between the teeth; from F. croquer, 'to croake, creak, crack, crash, crackle, as a bone which a dog breaks'; Cotgrave. In the game, croquet means 'a sharp tap, smart blow,' as shewn by the Walloon croque, a blow, filip, jerk, and croquer, to filip (see Sigart). This Walloon croque is the same as F. croc, a cracking or crunching sound, and croquer is, literally, to crack. These are words of imitative origin, and a mere variation of crack, from the imitative

CROSS. Instead of (F., = L.), read (Prov., = L.). There are two M. E. forms of the word, crois and cross; the former is obviously derived from O. F. crois, a cross, from Lat. acc. crucem. But this will not account for the form cross, and consequently, the derivation of the mod. E. cross has long been a puzzle. Stratmann compares E. cross with Icel. kross, but this is not to the purpose; for the word kross is merely a borrowed word in Icelandic, and I think it obvious that the Icel. kross was borrowed, like some other ecclesiastical terms, directly from English. Vigfusson remarks that the earliest poets use the Latin form, so that in the Edda we find helgum crúci; but later the word kross came in, clearly (in my opinion) as a borrowing from English and not as a mere modification of cruci or crucem. It remains to point out whence we borrowed this remarkable form. My solution is, that we took it directly from Provençal, or Southern French, at the time of the first crusade, about A.D. 1097. The form cross occurs as early as in Layamon, l. 31386, and in the very early Legend of St. Katharine, l. 727; but a much earlier example occurs in the Norman Chronicle of Geoffrey Gaimar (ed. Wright, l. 2833), who seems to introduce it as an E. word. The date of this is about 1150, and I take it to be a very early instance. The word when once caught up would soon spread rapidly and far, from the nature of the case. That this is the right solution appears to be fully confirmed by the fact that crusade is also Provençal; see remarks on Crusade below. Accordingly, the etymology of cross is from Prov. cross or croz, a word in early use; see Bartsch, Chrestomathie Provençale. Lastly, the Prov. cross is from the Lat. crucem, acc. of crux, or possibly from the nom. crux itself. I hope this solution may decide a point of some difficulty. As the quotation from Gaimar cannot fail to be of interest, I give it at length; note that he also employs the form crois, which is the Northern F. or Norman form. He is speaking of the death of Elle (Ælla), and he says of the place where the king fell, that 'Elle-croft est ore appele; Devers le west une crois y ad; En milu d'Engleterre est ad; Éngleis l'apelent Elle-cros.' I.e. 'it was afterwards called Elle-croft; towards the west there is a cross; it was in the midst of England, and the English call it Elle-cros.' We thus learn that a place called 'Ælla's croft' afterwards had a cross set up near it, which came to be called 'Ælla's cross.'

CROTCHET. M. E. crochet, apparently as a musical term; Catholicon Anglicum, p. 83; Towneley Mysteries, 116.

CROUCH. Cf. also 'Knyghtes crouche hem to, and cruche full lowe;' P. Plowman's Crede, l. 751.

CROWD (2). See the remarks upon the Low Lat. chrolta, a crowd, W. crwth, &c. in Rhys, Lectures on W. Philology, p. 118. He also cites Irish cruí, a fiddle, also a hump; and shews that the instrument was named from its shape, the word being allied to Gk. κῤῥός, curved, arched, round, humped, convex. See Curve. And see Rote (2), which is the same word. Doublet, rote (2).

CRUET. M. E. cruet, Prompt. Parv.; Joseph of Arim. l. 285; Catholicon Anglicum, p. 84, note 4; Paston Letters, i. 470 (A.D. 1459); Gesta Romanorum, p. 189. Anglo-F. cruet, in the Will of the Black Prince, as noted by Way. Dimin. of O. F. cruye, a pitcher of stone-ware (Roquefort); which I think is plainly from Dn. kruik, as already suggested.

CRUMPET, a kind of soft bread-cake. (W.) In Todd's Johnson. Prob. an E. corruption of W. crempog, also crammuyth, a pancake or fritter. (D. Silvan Evans.) This is much more likely than Todd's derivation from A. S. crompeht, wrinkled, which is merely an adj., and much the same as E. crumpled.

CRUSADE. Instead of (F., -Prov., -L.), I think we may read (Prov., -L.). Though the word crusade does not appear in literature, I think we may safely suppose that it dates, in popular speech, from the time of the crusades. In the quotation given from Bacon, the spelling croisado is evidently a mere adaptation of F. croisade, which again is a word adapted to F. spelling from the Prov. croisada, by turning the o of the Prov. form eros into the oi of the F. crois. But the spelling of the E. word points directly to the Prov. croisada itself, and was (I believe) introduced directly from Provençal in company with the remarkable form cross; see remarks on CROSS (above). Further, the Prov. croisada does not seem to have meant 'crusade' in the first instance, but merely 'marked with the cross.' It is properly formed as if from the fem. of a pp. of a verb *crossar, to mark with a cross, to cross, from the sb. cross, a cross.

CRUSTY, ill-tempered. (E.?) Under Crust, I have given a reference for crusty to Beaumont and Fletcher, Bloody Brother, iii. 2. 23. It occurs also in the play of Cambyse (ab. 1561), in Hazlitt's Old Plays, iv. 184, last line. I feel disposed to accept Mr. Palmer's explanation, in his Folk-Etymology, that crusty is nothing but another form of cursy, i. e. 'curst-like,' since curst has the precise sense of ill-tempered, not only in Shakespeare, but even as early as in the Cursor Mundi, l. 19201. Curst is for cursed, pp. of curse, q. v. We even find crust as a term of abuse, as: 'What an old crust it is!' A Merry Knack to Know a Knave, in Hazlitt's Old Plays, vi. 539, last line. See Curse.

CUB, l. 4. Dele 'cf. W. cenau, a whelp, from ci, a dog;' the W. cenau (not cenau), properly means 'offspring,' and is more likely to be related to W. cenedi, generation, kindred.

CUBEB, the spicy berry of a tropical plant. (F., -Span., -Arab.) Spelt guybybes, pl., in Mandeville, Trav. p. 50; the Lat. text has cubeba. Spelt cubebes, pl., in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 12. Mentioned, under the Anglo-French form cubibes, pl., in the Liber Albus, p. 230. - F. cubebe, pl. cubebes, 'cubebs, an aromaticall and Indian fruit;' Cotgrave. - Span. cubeba, fem. sing. - Arab. kabābah, pl. kabābah, cubeb, an aromatic; Rich. Dict. p. 1166. See also Devic, Supp. to Littré.

CUD. Wedgwood objects that the cud is not food chewed over again, being swallowed in the first instance without chewing, and he identifies cud and quid with 'Icel. quidr, the paunch or maw.' The new edition of Bosworth's Dict. gives numerous forms, viz. cuidu, cwoda, cweodo, cwidu, cudu, and this A. S. term was applied not only to the cud, but to mastieh, which is certainly allied to masticate. See A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 54, 56, 66, 118, 178, 182, 192, 270, 308; iii. 72, 124, 134. Since i passes into eo, and wi into wu (whence u), the oldest form is cwidu, gen. cwidewes or cwidwes (base KWIDWA); this cannot be identified with (though it may be allied to) A. S. cwip, gen. cwipes, the womb, Icel. kwiðr. At the same time, the sb. cwidu is so far removed in form from the verb céowan that it is hard to see how to connect them. More light is desired.

CURTILAGE, a court-yard. (F., -L.) 'All the comedities (sic) wythyn the seid gardyn and curtelage;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 46 (A.D. 1467). Formed, with suffix -age, from O. F. courtill, 'a back-yard;' Cot. - Low L. cortillum, an enclosure, small yard, occurring A.D. 1258 (Ducange); also cortile, the same. Dimin. of Low L. cortis, a court-yard; see Court (1).

CUSTARD. For the loss of r, cf. buskin, put for bruskin.

CUSTOM. See Costume, where the Low Lat. costuma is differently and more simply accounted for; it seems quite sufficient to take costuma as merely shortened from consuetudinem. Cf. amertume, bitterness, from amaritudinem, and enclume, an anvil, from incudinem. See Scheler and Bracher.

CUTLER. Anglo-French coillere, Liber Custumarum, p. 185.

CYGNET. The form cisne appears even in Anglo-French, in the Bestiary of Philip de Thaur, l. 1090. Some suppose that Low Lat. cecinius is derived, after all, from Gk. κύκνος; see Diez, 4th ed. p. 714.

CYPRESS (2). Not (L.), but (F., -L.). I have now no doubt that the E. cipres, explained as 'a fine curled linnen' in Minshew (1627), and equated by him to O. F. crepe, Lat. byssus crispata, is nothing but an E. travesty of the O. F. crepe, whence mod. E. crape. It will be observed that both Palgrave and Cotgrave explain crepe by 'cypress' or 'cipres.' The word occurs as early as in P. Plowman, B. xv. 224, where it is spelt cipres and cypirs. I suppose that O. F. crepe was translated as crisp (correctly), that crisp became crips, and was then recast as cipres. The form crips for crisp is noted under Crisp, q. v. Another form is Lowl. Sc. kirsp, fine linen, used by Dunbar, Twa Maryit Wemen, ll. 23, 138. ¶ This explanation, with some of the same illustrations, is given in Palmer's Folk-Etymology. It occurred to me quite independently. I doubt if Lat. cyperus has anything to do with it.

CZAR. Not (Russ.), but (Russ., -L.). The argument quoted from the Eng. Cyclopædia, as to the distinction made by the Russians between czar and kesar, is not sound; two derivatives from the same source being often thus differentiated. What is more to the point is, that it is also wrong. The Russian word czar, better written tsar, is nothing but an adaptation of the Latin Cæsar, and the connection does admit of direct proof, as has been pointed out to me by Mr. Sweet. In Matt. xiii. 24, 'the kingdom of heaven,' is, in modern Russian, tsarstvo nebesnoe; but the corresponding passage, in the Old Bulgarian version printed at p. 275 of Schleicher's Indogermanische Chrestomathie, has česarstvo nebesnoe. Here is clear evidence that tsar is for Cæsar. Consequently, czar is not Russian, but Latin.

DACE. The etymology is proved by the Anglo-French form daces, pl., in the Liber Custumarum, p. 279.

DADO, the die, or square part in the middle of the pedestal of a column, between the base and the cornice; also, that part of an apartment between the plinth and the impost moulding. (Ital., -L.) So defined by Gwilt, in Webster; see also Gloss. of Architecture, Oxford, 1840. The word is old, and occurs in Phillips, ed. 1706. Like some other architectural terms, it is Italian. - Ital. dado, a die, cube, pedestal; Torriano (1688) has 'dado, any kind of dye to play withall, any cube or square thing.' The pl. dadi, dice, is in Florio, from a sing. dado. The same word as Span. dado, O. F. det; see further under Die (2), which is a doublet.

DAFFODIL, DAFFADILL. 'An unexplained var. of Affadyll, affodylle, adaptation of Med. Bot. Latin Affodillus, prob. late Lat. asphodillus,* cl. Lat. Asphodilus, Asphodelus, from Greek. Another med. Lat. corr. was Aphrodillus, whence F. afrodille. Half-a-dozen guesses have been made at the origin of the initial D: as playful variation, like Ted for Edward, Dan (in the north) for Andrew; the northern article t' affodill, the southern article th' affodill; in Kent d' affodill, or (?) d' affodill (Cotgr. actually has th' affodill); the Dutch bulb-growers de affodil, the F. (presumed) fleur d'afrodille, &c. The F. was least likely, as there was no reason to suppose that the F. afrodille and Eng. affadyll ever came into contact. Some who saw allusion to Aphrodite in Aphrodillus, also saw Daphne in Daffodil; already in 16th cent. Daffadowndilly was given to the shrub Daphne Mezereum, as still in the North. Affadyl was properly Asphodelus; but owing to the epithet Lavus tibi being loosely applied both to spec. of Asphodelus and Narcissus, these very different plants were confused in England, and Asphodelus being rare, and Narcissus common, it tended to cling to the latter. Turner, 1551, "I could neuer se thys ryght affodil in England but ones, for the herbe that the people calleth here Affodill or daffodill is a kynd of Narcissus." Botanists finding they could not overthrow the popular application of daffodill, made a distinction. In Lyte, Gerarde, &c., all the Asphodeli are Affodils, and all the Narcissi Daffodils. But the most common Narcissus in Eng. was the "Yellow Daffodill" of our commons, to which as our wild species "Daffodil" has tended to be confined since Shakespeare; "White Daffodil" or "Poet's Lily" is no longer called a daffodil. Daffadilly, daffadowndilly, &c., are all early variants; they show playful variation, and suggest that this had to do with the first appearance of Daffodil itself. At least all early evidence shows it was of purely English rise.' Note by Dr. Murray, in Phil. Soc. Proceedings, Feb. 6, 1880.

DAINTY. The etymology is confirmed by the use of M. E. deynous in the sense of O. F. desdaigneux, disdainful, which see in Cotgrave; and of M. E. digne in just the same sense; see Catholicon Anglicum, p. 95, note 4. Observe that the word dis-dain gives precisely the same formation of -dain from Lat. dignus.

DALE, l. 9. Read 'See Dell.' But deal is unrelated.

DALLY. The etymology here given is strongly supported by the occurrence of the prov. E. dwallee or tell doil, to talk incoherently. A man in his cups who talks in a rambling style, is said, in Devonshire, to dwallee. 'Dest dwallee, or tell doil?' i. e. are you talking incoherently, or speaking nonsense? Exmoor Scolding, Bout the First, last line.

DAMASK, l. 6. For Heb. Dameseq, read Heb. Dammeseq (with dagesh forte); Heb. dmeseq is better written dēmeseq.—A. L. M.

DAMP. The Swed. dialects actually have the strong verb dimba, to steam, emit vapour, pt. t. damb, pl. dumbu, supine dumbið; whence dampen, damp (Rietz). The mod. Swed. dimma, mist, haze, was formerly dimba, as in Widegren.

DANGLE. Cf. also Swed. danka, to saunter about, and the phrase slå dank, to be idle.

DASTARD. Rietz gives Swed. dial. dasa, to lie idle, daska, to be lazy, dasig, idle. Godefroy gives O. F. daser, to dream.

DATE (2). Δάκτυλος, a date, is not a genuine Gk. word, but was confused with the Gk. δάκτυλος, a finger, in popular etymology, from an imagined likeness between the date and the end of a finger. It is of Semitic origin; in Wharton's Etyma Græca, it is called Phœnician. Cf. Arab. daqal, which Richardson (Dict. p. 679) explains by 'the worst kind of dates'; also Heb. diglāh, proper name, said to mean 'palm-tree' in Smith, Dict. of the Bible, s. v. Diklah; and see Speaker's Comment. Gen. x. 27. The Anglo-French dates, pl., occurs in the Liber Albus, p. 224.

DAUB. Mr. Nicol's etymology of daub, given at p. 153, is clinched by the fact that, in the Liber Custumarum, we have the Anglo-French form daubours, pl. daubers, at p. 99, whilst at p. 52 the Lat. form is dealbatores.

DEAL (3), a thin plank of timber. (Du.) At p. 154, this word is identified with deal (1), which is a mistake. The word is not E., but Dutch. 'Xvj. deles' are mentioned A. D. 1400; N. and Q. 6 S. viii. 399. 'A thousand deal-boards to make huts for the soldiers'; Clarendon, Civil War, ii. 675. (R.) Earlier, in Florio (1598), we find: 'Doga, a deale boord to make hogsheds with.'—Du. deel, fem., deal, board, plank, threshing-floor (distinct from deel, deal, part, which is neuter). In O. Du. the word was dissyllabic; Hexham gives deele, 'a planck, or a board' (distinct from deel, deyl, a part). + Low G. dele, a board (which in the Bremen Wörterbuch is wrongly connected with A. S. dēl). + G. diele, board, plank; M. H. G. dille; O. H. G. thill, also dillā. + A. S. pille, E. thill. Thus deal (3) is the same word with Thill, q. v. ¶ The note to thill (p. 636) should be deleted, having been written under a false impression. I have there said that the connection of deal (3) with thill is doubtful; but now revoke that opinion, as the words are closely allied, and the exact equivalent of deal (3) occurs in the truly E. word thel, a plank, used as late as 1586; see N. and Q. 6 S. vii. 249. The use of Du. d for Eng. th appears again in drill (1), q. v., and in deck.

DECANT. Not (F.,—Ital.,—O. H. G.), but (F.,—Ital.,—L.,—Gk.). See note on Cant (2) above, and on Canton.

DECEMBER, the twelfth month. (L.) In Chaucer, On the Astrolabe, pt. i. § 10, l. 10.—L. December, the tenth month of the Roman year, as at first reckoned.—L. decem, ten. See Ten. ¶ Under November and October, note that the reckoning only applies to the Roman year, as at first reckoned.

DECOY. An etymology from Du. eende-kooi, a duck-coy, or decoy for ducks, has been suggested; this Du. word is given in Sewel. I cannot think it is right, for several reasons. In the first place, we should not have dropped an accented syllable; dropped syllables are unaccented, as every one must have noticed. Next, eende-kooi is, like the E. duck-coy (given in Todd's Johnson), a compound word of which the essential part kooi appears to me to be nothing but a borrowing from French, or, not improbably, from English, so that we are taken back to the same original as before. Kooi is O. Du. koye, 'a cage, or a stall; also, a cabin or sleeping-place in a ship,' Hexham. Surely not a Du. word, but mere French. The derivation of acoy in Spenser is obvious; and we must remember that the verb to coy, in English, is older than 1440. I merely quoted 'coyyn, blandior,' from the Prompt. Parv., because I thought it amply sufficient; but it is easy to add further evidence. We also find, at the same reference: 'Coynge, or styrynge to done a werke, Instigacio;' which is very much to the point. Again, Palsgrave has 'I coye, I styll or apayse, Ie acqwoyse; I can nat coye hym, je ne le puis pas acqwoyser.' In the Rom. of the Rose, l. 3564, we find: 'Which alle his paines mighte accocie,' i. e. alleviate. 'As when he coyde The closed nunne in towre,' said of Jupiter and Danae; Turberville. To a late Acquainted Friend. Hence the sb. coy or decoy, and the verb to decoy, which appears to be earlier than duck-coy. See coy-duck in Davies, Supplementary Glossary. I adhere to the derivation given, which will, I think, be acquiesced in by such as are best acquainted with the use of the M. E. word. See striking examples of coy, verb, to court, to entice, in Todd's Johnson. If the Du. derivation be held, then the word is (Du.,—F.,—L.).

DEFAME. Put for diffame, as already said; the Anglo-French pp. pl. diffames, defamed, occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 386, an. 1364.

DEFAULT. However, the insertion of the l (which is a true part of the word) occurs early, in the Anglo-French defalte, Year-Books of Edw. I., i. 303; defaultte, id. ii. 5; but defaute, id. i. 7.

DEFT. neat, dexterous. (E.) In Chapman, tr. of Homer's Iliad, b. i. l. 11 from end. The adv. deftly is commoner; Macb. iv. i. 68. M. E. daft, deft, (1) becoming, mild, gentle, (2) innocent, whence the sense of 'foolish,' as in prov. E. daft; Ormulum, 2175, 4610; Bestiary, 37; cf. daftelike, fittingly, becomingly, Orm. 1215. A. S. dæft, as seen in ge-dæfte, mild, gentle, meek, Matt. xxi. 5; ge-dæflice, fitly, seasonably, Ælfred, tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, ed. Sweet, p. 97, l. 15; and see l. 17. Cf. also dæftan, and ge-dæftan; to prepare, Ælf. Hom. i. 212, 362. The t is merely excrement, and disappears in prov. E. and M. E. daff, daffe, a foolish person, P. Plowman, B. i. l. 138; formed from the base daf-, to fit, appearing in A. S. ge-dafen, fit (Grein), the pp. of a lost strong verb ge-dafan or dafan, to fit, suit. + Du. deftig, grave, respectable, genteel; Low G. deftig, fit, good, excellent. + Goth. ga-dops, ga-dops, fitting, fit; from ga-daban, to happen, befall, to be fit. All from Teut. base DAB, to suit; Fick, i. 633, iii. 144. Cf. also Russ. dobruii, good; Lith. dabinti, to adorn, dabnus, beautiful, &c. Doublet, daft, in a sinister sense, as, 'daft, doltish,' in Levins. Der. deft-ly, as above; deft-ness.

DELECTABLE. The earliest example I have met with is the adv. delectably (sic), in Mandeville's Trav. p. 278.

DELTA. Not (Gk.), but (Gk.,—Phœnician). The Heb. dāleth and Gk. δέλτα are both from the Phœnician name of the letter.

DEMESNE. In Anglo-French we find both the true spelling demene, Year-Books of Edw. I., i. 5, 257; and the false spelling demesne, id. ii. 19. In the Liber Custumarum, p. 353, demesne is expressed by the Lat. abl. sing. dominico, in accordance with the etymology.

DEMIJOHN, a glass vessel with a large body and small neck, enclosed in wickerwork. (F.,—Pers.) In Webster.—F. dame-jeanne, 'demijohn;' Hamilton.—Arab. damjāna, damajāna, written as damdjāna or damadjāna by Devic (Supp. to Littré), who says that it occurs in Boethor's French-Arabic Dict. as the equivalent of F. damejeanne. The sense is 'a large glass vessel.' The name is said to be from that of the Persian town of Damaghan, formerly famous for its glass-works; see Taylor, Words and Places. The town is called Damghan in Black's Atlas, and is in the province of Khorassan, not far from the extreme S.E. point of the Caspian Sea.

DERRICK, a kind of crane for raising weights. (Du.) Applied to a sort of crane from its likeness to a gallows; and the term derrick crane had special reference to a once celebrated hangman of the name of Derrick, who was employed at Tyburn. He is mentioned in Blount's Gloss., ed. 1674, and Mr. Tancock sends me the following clear example. 'The theefe that dyes at Tyburne . . . is not halfe so dangerous . . . as the Politick Bankrupt. I would there were a Derrick to hang vp him too;' T. Dekker, Seven Deadly Sins of London (1606); ed. Arber, p. 17. The name is Dutch; Sewel's Du. Dict. (p. 523) gives Diederik, Dierryk, and Dirk as varying forms of the same name. This name answers to the G. Dietrich, A. S. þeodric, i. e. 'chief of the people.' The A. S. þeod is cognate with Goth. thiuda, people; see Dutch. The suffix -ric answers to Goth. -reiks, as in Frithareiks, Frederick; cp. Goth. reiks, adj., chief, mighty, hence rich; see Rich.

DESCRY. The form is not a good one, and should rather have been descrive. Mätzner refers it to O. F. descrier, but omits to notice that this verb meant 'to cry down, publicly to discredit, disparage, disgrace, publish the faults,' &c. (see Cotgrave); i. e. it is the mod. E. decry. Descry is merely short for descrive, due to the O. F. descrire = descrive. Accordingly, the Prompt. Parv. has 'descryynge, descriptio;' and 'descryyn, describo.' It was at first an heraldic term; see quotations in Mätzner, and esp. note P. Plowman, C-text, xxiii. 94: 'er heraudes of armes hadden discriued lordes' = before the heralds of arms had described (as usual) the combatants, i. e. proclaimed their names. The herald's business was certainly not to decry, but the converse. In this passage from P. Plowman, two MSS. have discriuede, descriued; two have discreued, descreued; only one has the clipped form discried. In connection with this word we should note the following quotation from Sir Degrevant, ll. 1857-1860: 'I knewe never mane so wys That couth telle the servise, Ne scrye the metys of prys Was servyd in that sale.' Halliwell explains scrye by descry, but the sense required is obviously describe; either scrye is short for descrye (= describe) just as spite is short for despite, or else scrye represents the simple O. F. verb escrire, to write, relate in writing. Either will serve, and both take us back to Lat. scribere.

DESPISE. Derived, not from the pp. despiz (= despits), as given at p. 162, but from the stem despis-, appearing in the pres. pt. despis-ant, Stat. of the Realm, i. 162, an. 1311; in the pres. pl. despisi-, Langtoft's Chron. i. 104; in the imperf. s. despis-ayt, id. i. 26; &c. See further examples in Bartsch, Chrestomathie Française.

DETRIMENT. Rightly spelt in bk. ii. c. 3 of the edition of the Castel of Helth pr. in 1539.

DEUCE (2). I merely note here that the G. Daus is borrowed from the Low G. dās (Weigand); and the latter is the same as the Du. deus, copied precisely from the Lat. Deus. The A. S. þyrs, Icel. þurs, cited by Wedgwood, is a different word; it means a stupid giant, and I know of no evidence that such a being was ever sworn by. Outzen, in his Fries. Dict., says that the pl. duse meant some sort of demons, but he is vague; and he is not justified in citing Icel. *þyr*s.

DIAPER. Not (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk.), but (F., -Ital., -L., -Gk., -Arab.); see Jasper.

DICTION. l. 3. The derivation of L. dictio from the L. pp. dictus calls for a remark. Dictio is, more strictly, from the stem of the supine dictum. But the supine is so unfamiliar a form as compared with that of the pp., that I have, throughout the dictionary, given the pp. form instead. As the stem of the supine is the same as that of the pp., it makes no practical difference.

DINE. Mahn (in Webster) proposes to derive O. F. disner from Lat. disieunare, to break one's fast; see Dis- and Jejune. The sense is excellent, the contraction violent. Some quotations which seem to point this way are cited by Wedgwood, shewing that O. F. desjeuner and disner had much the same sense. Thus Froissart has: 'Les Gantois se desjeunèrent d'un peu de vin et de pain pour tout: quand cestui disner fut passé,' &c. And again, 'J'ay faim, si me vueil desjeuner; Delivrez vous, alez au vin; Et vous, fille, tandis Aubin Alez querre, si disnerons.' Miracle de N[otre] D[ame], in Ancien Théâtre Français, p. 336. But this supposition is at once set aside by the fact that disnare already appears as a Low Lat. form in the ninth century, as shewn by Littré, and we cannot suppose disnare to be contracted from F. of the 13th century. Littré shews the etym. from decenare to be possible; for (1) it could become decinare, as is proved by the occurrence of F. reciner (= recenare) in Cotgrave; and (2) the loss of i is paralleled by the loss of the same vowel in Ital. bugna (= buccina).

DINGLE. The M. E. dingle occurs in the sense of 'depth' or 'hollow'; as in despre pen eni sea-dingle, deeper than any sea-depth, O. Eng. Hom. i. 263, l. 14. Without the dimin. suffix, we find A. S. ding, a dark prison (Grein); which perhaps stands for *dyng. Cf. Icel. dyngja, a lady's bower, O. H. G. tunc, an apartment for living in winter, an underground cave. The root is uncertain, and the relationship (if any) to dimble has not been clearly made out. (We also find dumble, a dingle; N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 494.)

DIP. The A. S. dyppan stands for *dup-ian, regularly formed as if from a strong verb *deōpan, pt. t. pl. *dupon, which does not, however, appear. The Teut. base is DUP, whence also Deep, q. v. See Ettmüller's A. S. Dictionary, p. 566.

DIPHThERIA. Coined A. D. 1859; see The Times, Dec. 6, 1882 (leader). The form διφθέρα from διφθεῖν is quite regular, being put for ε before double consonants; Wharton, Etyma Græca, p. 146. —A. L. M.

DIPHThONG. So spelt in Palsgrave, Introd. p. xviii.

DIRK. The relationship of Irish duire to Du. dolk, suggested by Mahn, who takes Du. dolk, &c., to be of Celtic origin, is very doubtful. Some suppose Du. dolk, G. dolch, to be of Slavonic origin; cf. Bohemian and Polish tuľich, a dagger (which, however, may be a non-Slavonic word).

DISCIPLE. The Lat. discipulus is almost certainly a corruption of *disciculus, which would be a regular formation; see Vanicek.

DISCUSS. We find the pp. discusse (= discussé) in Anglo-French, Stat. of the Realm, i. 328, an. 1352; but it is merely a coined word from Lat. discussus. The sb. discussion is a true form; see Cotgrave.

DISMAL. The frequent occurrence of the phrase dismal day must be noted. 'Her disemale daies, and her fatal houres,' Lydgate, Story of Thebes, pt. iii (How the wife of Amphiorax, &c.); in Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, fol. 370, l. 3. 'One only dismall day;' Gascoigne's Works, ed. Hazlitt, l. 404. 'Some dismold day;' id. i. 89. 'A crosse or a dismall daie;' Holinshed, Descr. of Ireland, ed. 1808, p. 24. 'Diesmalle, as a diesmalle day;' Palsgrave. The earliest example I have yet found is the phr. in the dismale, introduced in Langtoft's Chronicle; see Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 303, l. 477. Cf. also Span. rentas decimales, tithe-rents, dezmar, to tithe; diezmal, tenth, diezmar, to decimate, to tithe. I believe I am right. If so, no other else is right as to this word. Another observation worth making is that Godefroy's O. F. Dict. (though it does not give the adj. dismal), gives a great many derivatives from disme, a tithe, and conveys fresh information. Thus he notes dismier, vb. to tithe, also to despoil (a sense which is truly significant); dismage, right of tithing, dismeor, dismeres, an exactor of tithes; dismerie, exaction of tithes; dismeret, relating to tithes, dismeresse, adj., where tithes are exacted; dismeron, a levying of tithes; dismet, right of tithing. He even has decimal, adj. subject to a tithe. Just as our cheat comes from eschator, so dismal may have reference to the exactions of tithe-leviers. Godefroy, s. v. dismeor, quotes a passage about one of these men who had robbed many good people of their wheat-sheaves sous l'ombre de la dismerie, under pretence of tithing.

DISMAY. The O. F. desmayer, dismayer, occurs in Palsgrave. He gives: 'I dismaye, le desmaye, and le esmaye; I never sawe man in my lyfe sorer dismayed, jamays a ma vie ne vis homme plus grandement esmaye, or dismaye.'

DISPENSE. ll. 5 to 7. After (pp. dispensus), read as follows: Dispensere means to weigh out, hence to weigh out or spend money; cf. Lat. dispendium, expense. — Lat. dis, apart; and pendere, to weigh. See Pendant. Doublet, spend, q. v.

DISPOSE. Not (F., -L.), but (F., -L. and Gk.). See POSE.

DITTANY, the name of a plant. (F., -L., -Gk.) 'Dictamnus groweth in Candy, and . . . maye be named in Englishe righte Dittany, for some cal Lepidium also Dittany;' Turner, Names of Herbes (1548), pp. 34, 47. Also called dittander (Prior). M. E. ditane, delany, Wright's Vocab. i. 225, col. 1; 265, col. 1. — O. F. dictame, 'the herb dittany, dittander;' Cot. Also O. F. ditaunder, Wright's Vocab. i. 140, col. 1. — Lat. dictamnium, acc. of dictamnium or dictamnus. — Gk. δικταμνον, δικταμνος, also δικταμον, δικταμος, dittany; so named from mount Dicté in Crete, where it grew abundantly.

DIVE. l. 3. Read: 'A. S. dyfan, to dive, Grein, i. 214, a weak verb due to the strong verb dyfan, id. 213.' See Ettmüller, p. 570.

DOCK (1). Cf. Swed. docka, a skein (of silk); perhaps a length cut off.

DODGE. It occurs earlier, in Gammer Gurton's Needle. 'My gammer ga' me the dodge;' and again, 'dost but dodge;' i. e. thou dost but quibble; Hazlitt's Old Plays, iii. 193, 254. Florio has Ital. arrouelare, 'to wheele or turne about, to dodge, to wrangle, to chafe.'

DODO. Not (Port.), but (Port., -E.). After all, this is an E. word. It is merely the Port. form of prov. E. dold, the Devonshire form of dolt; doubtless picked up by Port. sailors from S. of England sailors. See Dolt; and Diez, s. v. doudo, 4th ed. p. 445. Hence dodo, like booby, is a 'stupid' bird. (Cf. dude.)

DOG. verb. Cf. 'I dogge one, I followe hym to espye whyder he gothe;' Palsgrave.

DOG-CHEAP. Florio (1598) has 'Vil, vile, vile, base, . . . good cheape, of little price, dogge cheape.'

DOGE. Doge is the Venetian form, answering to an Ital. form *doce, which would be the regular derivative of Lat. acc. ducem. The usual Ital. duca is an irregular form, due to the Byzantine Greek δοῦκα, accus. of δοῦς, a Greek spelling of Lat. dux. See Scheler and Diez.

DOGGEDLY. Occurs in the Tale of Beryn, ed. Furnivall, l. 180r.

DOILY. I now find that there is authority for attributing this word to a personal name. 'The famous Doily is still fresh in every one's memory, who raised a fortune by finding out materials for such stuffs as might at once be cheap and genteel;' Spectator, no. 283, Jan. 24, 1712 (written by Budgell). This is hardly to be gainsaid; especially when taken in conjunction with the quotations given from Congreve's Way of the World, Act 3, sc. 10 (1700), and Dryden's Kind Keeper (1679), which last seems to be the earliest example. Steele speaks of his 'Doily suit;' Guardian, no. 102 (1713). It becomes clear that, as applied to a stuff, the name is certainly from 'the famous Doily,' whilst it is probable that the present use of the word, as applied to a small napkin, is (as already said) due to Du. duaal, a towel, Norfolk duile, a napkin. Further information regarding Mr. Doily is desired. Cf. 'Now in thy trunk thy D'Oily habit fold, The silken druggel ill can fence the cold' (1712); Gay, Trivia, b. i. l. 43.

DOLL. Another suggestion is that doll is the same word as Doll for Dorothy; this abbreviation occurs in Shakespeare. 'Capitulum, vox blandientis, Terent. O capitulum lepidissimum, O pleasant companion: o little pretie doll poll;' Cooper's Thesaurus, 1565. 'Drink, and dance, and pipe, and play, Kisse our dollies [mistresses] night and day;' Herrick, Hesperides, A Lyric to Mirth, ed. Hazlitt, p. 38 (Davies); or ed. Walford, p. 53. Perhaps further quotations may settle the question. Cf. Bartholomew Fair, by H. Morley, c. xvii., where the suggestion here given is thrown out, but without any evidence. It is a piece of special pleading, in which I have but little faith. Cf. E. Fries. dolske, a wooden doll (Koolman). The usual E. Fries. word for doll is dokke, dok; see Duck (3). Some pretend that doll is short for idol (contrary to the rule that accent is always persistent, so that the short form of idol would be ide), and quote a passage from Roger Edgeworth's Sermons, 1557, fol. xl. to prove it. This passage is given by Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology (note at p. 624), and proves nothing of the sort, in spite of the desperate endeavour made by Dibdin to force the word doll into the text by deliberately misprinting doll for idol when quoting the passage in his Library Companion, 1824, i. 83. This misleading substitution has imposed upon many.

DONKEY. 'Or, in the London phrase, thou Devonshire monkey, Thy Pegasus is nothing but a donkey;' Wolcot, P. Findar, ed. 1830, p. 116 (Davies). In use between 1774 and 1785; N. and Q. 3 S. vi. 432, 544.

DOOMSDAY-BOOK. The following quotation, sent me by Mr. Tancock, is worth notice. 'Hic liber ab indigenis Domesdei nuncupatur, id est, dies iudicii, per metaphoram; sicut enim districti et terribilis examinis illius novissimi sententia nulla tergiversationis arte valet eludi: sic... cum ventum fuerit ad librum, sententia ejus infatuari non potest vel impune declinari.' Dialogus de Scaccario, i. cap. 16; Select Charters, ed. Stubbs, 1881, p. 208. That is, the book was called Doomsday because its decision was final.

DORNICK, a kind of cloth (obsolete). Spelt dorneckes in Palsgrave. See Cambric.

DORY. See note on John Dory (below).

DOT. This sb. may be referred to the strong verb seen in Icel. detta, pt. t. datt, pp. dottinn, to drop, fall; Swed. dial. detta, pt. t. datt, supine duttit, to drop, fall. This is shewn by the Swed. dial. dett, sb., properly something that has fallen, also a dot, point (in writing), a small lump, dett, vb., to prick (Rietz). This makes clear the relationship to Du. dot, a little lump; orig. a spot made by something falling.

DOUGH. 'Massa, blóma, oððe dáh;' Wright's Voc. i. 85, col. 1. 'Massa, dāð, vel blóma;' id. i. 34, col. 2, where dāð is clearly an error of the scribe for dáh. The dat. dáge occurs in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 342, l. 18. Formed as if from *dáh, pt. t. of a strong verb *digan, to knead; this verb has not been found in A. S., but appears in Gothic. To Dr. Stratmann's suggestion that the Icel. for dough is 'deigr, masc.,' I reply that I copied 'deig' (neuter) from Vigfusson's Dictionary.

DOWAGER. The O. F. douagiere, a dowager, actually occurs in the 14th century; Littré, s. v. douairière, cites an example from Ducange, s. v. doageria.

DOWER. The spelling is very old; we find Anglo-French dowere, Year-Books of Edw. I., i. 29, 37; also douayre, Stat. of the Realm, i. 38 (an. 1275); cf. 'Dowary, douaire' in Palsgrave.

DRAG. The account here given should rather have been given s. v. Draw, the primary verb.

DRAGOON. Littré gives the date of the sense 'dragoon' as 1585, and the quotations which he gives make it quite clear that the name arose (as already suggested) from dragon in the sense of standard, which is much earlier, as shewn by my quotation from Rob. of Gloucester, and by a quotation given on p. 796 above, s. v. Craven.

DRAKE, last line. The sense is rather 'male duck,' since the suffix came to mean no more than this.

DRAWINGROOM. The full form appears in North's Examen, 1740, p. 67: 'Even the withdrawing Rooms of the Ladies were infected with it.' Cf. 'Leave, leave the drawing-room;' Congreve, Poem on Miss Temple, l. 1.

DRAY. 'Traine, a sled, a drag, or dray without wheels;' Cotgrave. M. E. drey, Palladius on Husbandry, vii. 39.

DRIFT. Cf. Swed. snödrifva, a snow-drift.

DRIVEL. Cf. Swed. drafvel, nonsense; fara med drafvel, to tell stories.

DRIZZLE. Note particularly Dan. drysse, to fall in drops, cited under Dross.

DROLL. Dr. Stratmann objects that the Icel. form is tröll; but Vigfusson expressly says that the form is troll, of which 'the later but erroneous form is tröll.'

DROSS. We find dat dros given as an Old Westphalian gloss of L. fæx; Mone, Quellen, p. 298. Cf. 'Auriculum, dros,' Wright's Voc. ii. 8, col. 2 (11th cent.); where auriculum is prob. allied to Low Lat. auriacum, put for L. auricula, brass.

DROUGHT. Dr. Stratmann objects that the A. S. word is not drugað, but drugað. Both forms, however, are found. 'Siccitas, vel ariditas, drugaþ;' Ælfric's Gloss., in Wright's Voc. i. 53, col. 2. 'Siccitas drugað, oððe háð;' id. i. 76, col. 2.

DROWSY. 'Drowsy, heavy for slepe, or onlusty;' Palsgrave (1530).

DUDGEON (1). We also find endugine. 'Which she . . . taking in great endugine;' Gratiae Ludentes, 1638, p. 118 (in Nares, s. v. endugine, ed. Halliwell and Wright). The W. en- is an intensive prefix; thus emwyn means very white, from gwyn, white. This clinches the suggested Celtic origin of the word.

DUDGEON (2). There is a considerably earlier example of the use of this word. It occurs in the sense of a material (prob. box-wood) used by a cutler. A cutler speaks of 'yuery [ivory], dogeon, horn, mapyll, and y° toel that belongeth to my crafte;' Arnold's Chron. (1502, repr. 1811), p. 245. Cf. 'swear upon my dudgeon-dagger;' Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, v. 271 (1599).

DULL. That A. S. dol, foolish, stands for dwol (earlier dwal), is proved by the occurrence of dwollic, adj. in the same sense. 'Nán dwollic sagn,' no foolish story, Judges xv. 19.

DUMB-BELL. The dumb-bell exercise was called 'ringing of the dumb-bells;' Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, bk. ii. c. 2, § 10. This explains the name.

DUMPS. 'I dumpe, I fall in a dumpe or musyng upon thynges, le me amuse;' Palsgrave. The root-verb is seen in Swed. dial. dimpa, to fall down plump, pt. t. damp, supine dumpið (Rietz). Cf. M. E. dumpen, to fall down plump, Allit. Poems, C. 362.

DUN (1). Also M. E. donne, Chaucer, Parl. of Foules, 334.

DUTY. The form is Anglo-French; we find duete, with the sense 'debt, obligation,' in Liber Albus, p. 211. Clearly a coined word.

DYE. 'Bis tincto cocco, tui gedeagadre deage,' i. e. with twice-dyed dye; Mone, Quellen, p. 352. 'Fucare, deagian,' id. p. 356. See further examples in Bosworth's Dict.

EARWIG. But in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 134, l. 4, the word wiega prob. means an earwig, and in this instance may mean 'wagger,' i. e. wriggler, rather than 'carrier' or horse. See Wag, Wing; and ✓ WAGH, no. 338, p. 742.

EASE. Several correspondents refer me to A. S. edðe, easy, the well-known word which appears in Uneath, q. v. It has nothing whatever to do with ease, which is plainly from the French. It is the etymology of the F. aise which is obscure; and, as to deriving the O. F. aise from A. S. edðe, I take it to be wholly out of the question. See what Diez has written about the Ital. form agio; also Scheler's note upon Diez, p. 705.

EASEMENT. 'Esement of the kechene to make in her meate,' use of the kitchen to cook her meat in; Bury Wills (1463), ed. Tymms, p. 22. The pl. easmentis occurs in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 138. See Ease.

EAVESDROPPER. I find a mention of 'euesdroppers vnder mennes walles or wyndowes by nyght or by day to bere tales' in a book on Court Baron, pr. by Pynson, fol. a 5, back.

EBONY. The Heb. word is hobhnim (hounim); prob. a non-Semitic word. The derivation from eben ('even') is now generally given up. See Gesenius, Dict. 8th ed.—A. L. M.

ECLAT. The prefixed e is merely due (as in esprit from L. spiritus) to the difficulty experienced by the French in pronouncing words beginning with sp and sk.

EGRET, the lesser white heron. (F., = O. H. G.) In Levins and Huloet. The Anglo-French egret occurs in the Liber Albus, p. 467. = O. F. egrette, aigrette, 'a fowl like a heron;' Cot. Dimin. of a form *aigre, of which Prov. aigron, a heron (cited by Diez) is an augmentative form. This Prov. aigron is the same as F. héron, O. F. hairon, a heron. *Aigre exactly answers to the O. H. G. heigr, heiger, a heron; and egret (for hegr-et) is merely the dimin. of the her. (= hegr.) in her-on. See Heron.

ELECAMPANE, a plant. (F., = L.) In Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xix. c. 5; spelt elycampane, Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. iii. c. 12. Shortened from F. enule-campane, 'the hearbe called helicampanie;' Cot. = L. inula campana; where inula is the Lat. name for elecampane in Pliny, as above. Campana, fem. of campanus, is a Low Lat. form, and perhaps means merely growing in the fields; cf. Lat. campaneus, of or pertaining to the fields (White), though the proper L. word for this is campestris; see Campestral. Mahn, in Webster, explains campana as meaning a bell, and compares the G. glockenwurz. This is doubtful, for the resemblance to a bell is by no means striking, and the G. for elecampane is alant, founded on the Gk. name ἐλένιον (Lat. helenium). In any case, campana is derived from L. campus, a field.

ELEVEN. The equation of Lith. -lika to Lat. decem has frequently been given. But it is much better to connect Lith. -lika with the Lith. verb likti, to be left remaining, to be left over, whence the adj. lėkas, left over. Nesselmann takes this view, and gives the examples antras lėkas, twelfth, i. e. 'second left over' (after ten), trėczas lėkas, thirteenth, &c.; and with these he connects the suffix -lika occurring in the cardinal numbers from 11 to 19. (For the root of the Lith. verb, see License.) Similarly, we may explain Goth. ain-lif as meaning 'one left over,' and connect it with Icel. lifa, to be left, remain; see Life. But it should be noticed that the Lith. and Goth. suffixes are from roots of different forms; see roots no. 325 and 307, p. 741.

ELF. The Swed. is alf, also elfva (J. N. Grönland). Widegren's Dictionary only gives elfvor, pl. elves; elfdans, a dance of elves.

ELIXIR. Perhaps (F., = Span., = Arab., = Gk.), rather than merely (Arab.). The M. E. elixir is from F. elixir (Cotgrave), which from Span. elixir. And it is the Span. form which is from Arab. el iksir, the philosopher's stone of the alchemists, essence. Devic (Supp. to Littré), following Dozy, shews that the Arab. iksir is unoriginal, and merely a transcription of Gk. ἐξήρ, dry, dried up (neut. of ἐξηρός), applied originally, I suppose, to the desiccated residuum left in the retort in the attempt to attain the desired result. With Gk. ξηρός, cf. Skt. kshai, to dry up (✓SKA).

ELOIGN, ELOIN, to remove and keep at a distance, to withdraw. (F., — L.) 'Eloine, to remove, banish, or send a great way from;' Blount's Nomo-lexicon. Still in use as a law term. Spenser writes esloigne, F. Q. i. 4. 20. — O. F. esloigner (mod. F. éloigner), 'to remove, banish, drive, set, put far away, keep aloof;' Cotgrave. — O. F. es-, prefix; and loing (mod. F. loin), 'far, a great way off;' Cot. — Lat. ex, off, away; longe, adv. afar, from longus, adj. long, far. See Ex- and Long; also Purloin.

EMBERS. Dr. Strattmann kindly refers me to: 'Eymbre, hote aschys, eymery or synder, Pruna;' Prompt. Parv. p. 136. This is clearly a Scand. form, from Icel. eimyrja. Cf. ymbers in Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 7 (Chesteys); imbres, embers, in Palsgrave.

EMBEZZLE. I have now little doubt that the etymology proposed, and explained at greater length s.v. imbecile, is quite right. Mr. Herrtage sends me a reference which strengthens the supposition. In a letter from Reginald Pole to Hen. VIII., dated 7 July, 1530, he speaks of a consultation in which the adverse party used every means to 'embecyll' the whole determination, that it might not take effect. See Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII., ed. Brewer, vol. iv. pt. 3, p. 2927. Mr. R. Roberts sends me some very curious instances. 'I have proposed and determined with myself to leave these bezels of these knights, and return to my village;' Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, 1652, fol. 158, back. 'They came where Sancho was, astonisht and embeseld with what he heard and saw;' id. fol. 236. 'Don Quixote was embeseld,' i.e. perplexed; id. fol. 262. Imbezil, to take away, occurs A.D. 1547; see N. and Q. 5 S. xi. 250. 'A feloe . . . that had embesled and conueied awaye a cup of golde;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms; Diogenes, § 83. See further examples in Palmer, Folk-Etymology. We may further note the following Anglo-French forms, viz. besille, he falters in walking, Life of Edw. Confessor, 2003; besele, pp. embezzled, Year-Books of Edw. I., iii. 453; besile, embezzled, stolen, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 62 (before A.D. 1272). The etymological sense appears in the following: 'You will not embezzle my servant with your benevolence, will you?' (i.e. weaken his allegiance, corrupt him); Ben Jonson, The Case is Altered, v. 2. A very early instance occurs in The Newe Booke of Justices of Peas, by Sir A. Fitzherbert, pr. by T. Petit in 1541, where we find: 'Imbesylment of Records. Also of those that imbesyll, take away, conuey, or willingly auoyde [i.e. wilfully remove] any Record, or parcel of wryt . . . that is felonye.'

EMBLEMENTS, the produce of sown lands, crops which a tenant may cut after the determination of his tenancy. (F., — L.) In Blount's Nomo-lexicon; and still in use. Formed with suffix -ment from O. F. embla-er, embla-er, also emblad-er, the same word as mod. F. emblav-er, 'to sow the ground with corn;' Cotgrave. See emblader in Roquefort, and emblaver in Littré. All these forms are from Low Lat. imbladare, to sow with corn; whence was formed the sb. imbladatura, produce of sown lands, with precisely the same force as the Low Lat. *imbladamentum (not found) which would be the equivalent of E. emblemment. — Lat. im-, for in, in, prefix; and Low Lat. bladum (F. blé), contraction of abladum = Lat. ablatum, as explained s.v. Badger.

EMBONPOINT, plumpness of person. (F., — L.) 'No more than what the French would call Aimable Embonpoint;' Cotgrave's Poems, Doris. Mere French. — F. embonpoint, 'fulness, plumpness;' Cot. Put for en bon point, in good condition, in good case. — Lat. in, in; bon-um, neut. of bonus, good; punctum, point. See In, Bounty, and Point.

EMBROIDER. Cf. the Anglo-French pp. pl. embroydez, embroidered, in the Statutes of the Realm, i. 380, an. 1363.

ENCROACH. 'And more euer to incroche redy was I bent;' Skelton, Death of Edward IV., l. 51; ed. Dyce, i. 3. 'Yf any persone make any encroching;' Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 92. M. E. encrochen, to catch hold of, seize, obtain; Morte Arthure, ed. Brock, 1243, 2036, 3426, 3525. The O. F. encrocher has not yet been found, the usual forms being either encrouer or acerocher. But Lacurne notes that encrochement occurs in Knyghton, p. 2715. 'Palsgrave has accroche as an E. word.'

ENDEAVOUR. 'He sholde endeuore hym;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 93, l. 21. Palsgrave has: 'I dever, I applye my mynde to do a thing, Je fays mon devoir;' and again (under im-, wrongly) he has: 'I indever my selfe to do a thyng, I payne my selfe, I indever me to do the best I can.' 'Ye will effectually endeuoir yourself;' Letter by Hen. VIII., in Royal Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 240. It is frequently reflexive, as in these examples, and in the P. Bk., Coll. 2 S. a. Easter.

ENDUE (2). I have noted, s.v. endue, that endue, to endow (cf.

Gen. xxx. 20), is unconnected with Lat. indue. But there is another verb endue, to clothe, which is merely a corruption of indue (1); just contrary to indue (2), which is a corruption of endue (1); cf. 'I indue, Je endoue;' Palsgrave. Thus, in Ps. 132. 9, we have 'let thy priests be clothed with righteousness;' in the Vulgate, 'sacerdotes tui induantur justitiam;' and hence the versicle in the Morning Prayer: 'endue thy ministers with righteousness.' (A. L. M.) See Indue (2).

ENGRAILED, indented with curved lines; in heraldry. (F., — L. and Teut.) Spelt engraylyt in The Book of St. Albans, pt. ii. fol. f 1, bk. — O. F. engresle, pp. of engresler, to engrail; Sherwood's Index to Cotgrave, s.v. ingrailed. — F. en, in; O. F. gresle, F. grêle, hail; because the edge or line seems as if indented or 'pitted' by the fall of hailstones. See further under En-, prefix; and the note upon Grail (3) below.

ENHANCE. The form is not uncommon in Anglo-French; we find the infin. enhancer, Stat. of the Realm, i. 393, an. 1371; enhancer, Lib. Custumarum, p. 219; enhancees, pp. pl., Stat. of the Realm, i. 159, an. 1311.

ENJOY. We find the Anglo-French enjoier, Stat. of the Realm, i. 310, an. 1351.

ENLARGE. Anglo-French enlargee, pp., Stat. of the Realm, i. 398, an. 1377; enlargiz, pp. pl., id. i. 97, an. 1285. — O. F. enlarger; Roquefort. Hence M. E. enlargen, Mandeville's Trav. p. 45; Palladius, bk. i. l. 316.

ENMITY. Anglo-F. enemite, Stat. Realm, i. 290, an. 1340; enemistez, pl., Langtoft's Chron. i. 352.

ENSUE. Strictly, the F. infin. is due to Low Latin insequere, substituted for Lat. insequi; see Sue.

ENTICE. Cf. also Low G. tikken, to touch slightly. The Bremen Wörterbuch also gives 'tikktakken, oft anstossen, reizen;' and G. reizen has the very sense 'to entice.'

ENVELOP. We find the simple F. verb voluper in the Anglo-F. phr. se volupe = folds itself up, Bestiary, l. 860. So also Walloon veloper, to form a ball or skein (Sigart); O. Ital. goluppare (with go for w), 'to fould, winde, wrap, roule, huddle vp,' Florio.

EPHAH. Heb. 'épháh, more usually 'éypháh, an ephah; possibly from an old Egyptian word of which the Coptic form is dipi. See Gesenius, ed. 8, p. 38; Speaker's Commentary, Exod. xvi. 36. — A. L. M.

EPHOD. The Heb. words are better written 'éphód, 'dphad;' to shew the initial Aleph. — A. L. M.

ERMINE. The Anglo-F. hermine (with h) is in Langtoft's Chron. i. 172; also ermin, Vie de St. Auban.

ERRANT. 'A thef errant;' Chaucer, C. T. 16173. The Anglo-F. errant translates Lat. transeuntem, journeying, in the Laws of Will. I. § 26; whilst errant signifies 'in eyre,' on the journey, on circuit, in Stat. of the Realm, i. 282, an. 1340; we also find such spellings as eiraunt, eyraunt; see Gloss. to Liber Albus and Liber Custumarum. The vb. errer or eirer, to wander, is from the sb. erre, 'way, path,' Cot.; or from the Low Lat. iterare, from iter; see Eyre. It comes to the same thing. Distinct from Err, but the same word (probably) as Arrant. See note on Arrant above.

ESCHEW. Cf. Anglo-F. eschure, Stat. of the Realm, i. 253, an. 1327; eschuer, Liber Albus, p. 369.

ESCROW, a deed delivered on condition. (F., — Teut.) A law term (Webster); the same word as M. E. scrowe, scrow, examples of which are given s.v. Scroll, q.v. It is the orig. word of which scroll is the diminutive.

ESCUAGE, a pecuniary satisfaction in lieu of feudal service. (F., — L.) In Blackstone, Comment., b. ii. c. 3. — O. F. escuage, given by Littré, s.v. écuage, who quotes from Ducange, s.v. scutagium, which is the Low Lat. form of the word. See also Roquefort. Formed with suffix -age from O. F. escu, a shield; because escuage was, at first, an aid given by service in the field. See Squire.

ESCUTCHEON. Anglo-F. escuchoun, Langtoft's Chron. i. 358. We find mention of 'iiij. scochens of armys' in Fabyan's will, A.D. 1511; see Fabyan, ed. Ellis, p. x. Also the spelling scochon, Book of St. Albans, pt. ii, fol. f 8.

ESSAY. A remarkably early use of this word occurs in the Dialogus de Scaccario, i. 3, pr. in Stubbs, Select Charters, 4th ed. 1881, p. 174, where it refers to the assay of money: 'examen, quod vulgo essayum dicitur' (O. W. Tancock).

ESSOIN, an excuse for not appearing in court. (F., — L. and Teut.) M. E. essoine, Chaucer, Pers. Tale, Introd. § 10. Spelt essoigne in Anglo-F., Stat. of Realm, i. 49, an. 1278; also essoine, Year-books of Edw. I., i. 13, assoynes, ibid. — O. F. essoine (also exoine), 'an essoine, or excuse;' Cot. Burguy gives essoine, essoigne, essoine, necessity, difficulty, hindrance, danger, peril, excuse, reason for not appearing in a court of justice.

β. In this difficult word the prefix is certainly O. F. es-, from Lat. ex, out. Soine is related to F. soin, solicitude, and appears in Low Lat. (A.D. 1110) as sonia, an impediment, excuse for non-appearance. The force of the prefix is merely intensive, so that essoine = a great impediment, peril, hindrance, sufficient excuse. Y. The Low Lat. has also sunnia, sunnis, with the same sense as sonia, and Diez cites an O. Ital. sogna and Prov. sonh as being cognate forms. The Low Lat. forms sunnis, sonies, sonia, sonnis, sunnia, &c. occur in the Lex Salica, ed. Hessels and Kern, Gloss. col. 673. Kern (id. col. 537) says that sunni (stem sunnia) means a lawful excuse, and that the Icel. form is naud-syn, need, necessity, also lawful excuse. Thus the F. soine is of Teut. origin, from the Teut. word seen in O. H. G. sunna, lawful excuse, O. Sax. sunnea, need, Icel. syn, protest, denial, naud-syn, need, excuse; cf. also Goth. sunja, truth, sunjon sik, to excuse oneself, sunjons, a setting oneself right, apology, defence; Icel. synjan, refusal. Fick (iii. 326) ranges these words under the Teut. form sonya, real, truthful, truthful excuse. They are further related to Lat. sons, guilty (orig. being, real), and to E. sooth. The root is ✓AS, to be. See further under Sin, Sooth, Suttee.

ESTOP, to bar, impede, stop up. (F., -L.) See Stop.

ESTOVERS, supplies of various necessities. (F., -L.) 'Common of estovers, i. e. necessities, . . . is a liberty of taking necessary wood,' &c.; Blackstone, Comment. b. ii. c. 2; b. iii. c. 8. [He erroneously derives it from estoffer, to stuff, which is a distinct word]. — O. F. estover, provisions; see Stover. The Anglo-F. estover, sb., sustenance, occurs in the Year-books of Edw. I., i. 19, 21, 231.

ESTREAT, a true copy of an original record. (F., -L.) In Blount; he refers us to Fitzherbert, Natura Brevium, foll. 57, 76. Anglo-F. estrete, Stat. of the Realm, i. 32, an. 1275. (In the Lib. Custumarum, p. 434, we have the Lat. gen. pl. extractarum.) The lit. sense is 'extract'. — O. F. estrete, fem. of estret, also spelt estrait, pp. of estraise, to extract (Burguy). — Lat. extracta, fem. of pp. of extrahere; see Extract. Der. estreat, vb., to extract a record, as a forfeited recognizance, and return to the court of exchequer for prosecution, also to levy fines under an estreat (Ogilvie). Doublet, extract.

EWER. The Anglo-F. Ewere appears as a proper name in the Liber Custumarum, p. 684. It means 'water-carrier' (Lat. aquarius). In the Year-books of Edw. I., iii. 367, we find the adj. eweret, meaning 'working by water,' and applied to a mill; in the same, i. 417, we find the sb. ewe, water. But I have lately succeeded in finding the Anglo-F. ewer in the very sense of 'ewer' or 'jug'; it occurs in a Collection of Royal Wills, ed. Nichols (1780), pp. 24, 27 (an. 1360).

EXCISE (1). Perhaps the earliest use of the word in E. is the following; it occurs in a composition between English merchants and those of Antwerp. 'The excise of euery clothe is' so much; Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 197. The etymology is disputed. The supposition that Du. aksis is a corruption of O. F. assise comes to the same thing as the statement of Ducange, that the Low Lat. accisia, excise, is a corruption of Low Lat. assisia, assise. This supposition, however, is open to a grave objection, viz. that the supposed corruption is one from an easy to a harder form. Hence Scheler and Littré prefer to take F. accise as a true word, and to derive it from Lat. accis-us, pp. of accidere, to cut into; from Lat. ac- (for ad), and cadere, to cut. Littré supposes that F. accise meant, originally, a tally scored with notches; hence, a score, a sum scored, a tax. Cf. E. tally. So also Weigand, s. v. Accise. In any case, the prefix is certainly from Lat. ad, not from Lat. ex.

EXCREMENT. The use, in Shakespeare, of excrement in the sense of hair, &c., seems to be due to a false etymology from ex-crescere, as if excrement meant 'out-growth.'

EXECUTRIX. Occurs in 1537, in Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 131. Spelt executrice (a F. form) in Fifty Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 8 (an. 1395).

EXEQUIES. See Exsequies (below).

EXERGUE, the small space left beneath the base-line of a subject engraved on a coin, left for the date or engraver's name. (F., -Gk.) The final ue is not pronounced, the word being French. It occurs in Todd's Johnson, and in works on coins. — F. exergue, used by Voltaire, Mœurs, 173 (Littré). So called because lying 'out of the work,' not belonging to the subject. — Gk. ἐξ, out of; ἐργον, work. See Ex- and Work.

EXILE. The etym. given of Lat. exsul is the usual one, but it is prob. wrong. It is more likely to be a derivative of Lat. salire; cf. exsilium (exilium), and the compounds præsul, consul, subsul. See Lewis and Short; also Vaníček.

EXPOSE. See note on Compose (above).

EXSEQUIES, the same as Exsequies, q. v. (p. 199). The Anglo-F. exsequies occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 224 (before A.D. 1307). The M. E. exsequies occurs A.D. 1444; Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 131.

FADGE. We must dismiss the connection with M. E. fægen,

A. S. fēgan. The form answers rather to M. E. fagen, to flatter, coax, fawn upon; for which see Catholicon Anglicum, p. 120, note 3. I think fadge may certainly be derived from A. S. fægian, to fit or adorn, allied to fæger, fair; see Fair. This leads to the same ✓PAK, to fit, as before. The A. S. fægian only occurs in the comp. dægian, to depict; 'ánlicnesse drihtnes on brede dægde,' i. e. the likeness of Christ depicted on a board; Ælfred, tr. of Bede, i. 25. The changes of sense from 'fit' to 'depict,' and from 'fit' to 'speak fair,' or 'flatter' can readily be imagined to be probable.

FAG-END. The suggestion that fag-end is for flag-end is almost certainly right. It may have been a technical term used in hawking. 'The federis at the wynges next the body be calde the flagg or the fagg federis;' Book of St. Albans, fol. b. 1.

FATH. The M. E. form fey is due to O. F. fei, whilst the M. E. form feith represents the O. F. feid, which is the earliest O. F. form, the d being due to L. acc. fidem. On the final -th, see H. Nicol's article in The Academy, no. 435, Sept. 4, 1880, p. 173, where this view is maintained. On the other hand, the fact that -th is a common ending for abstract nouns (such as health, wealth) may account for the change from d to th.

FALLACY. Spelt falacye, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 29, ed. Arber, p. 67, l. 10.

FARDEL (F., -Span., -Arab.) Besides O. F. fardel, we actually find the curious form hardel, and the dimin. hardellon, for which see Bartsch; and still more strangely, we find hardell, to pack in a bundle, even in English, in the Boke of St. Albans, leaf f. 4. These forms go far to settle the etymology. They are clearly Spanish, and due to the common substitution of h for f in that language. Consequently, the word is probably Moorish, and the Arabic origin is almost certain.

FARM. Rather (F., -L.) than (L.) I greatly doubt the connection with A. S. feorm, a feast, though the connection has often been asserted. Even the A. S. feormere is rather 'purveyor' than 'farmer;' besides which, the A. S. feorm is prob. Teutonic, and independent of Lat. firma. The M. E. ferme occurs first (perhaps) in Rob. of Glouc. p. 378, in the phr. sette ferme = let on lease. The Anglo-F. ferme occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 140, an. 1300. — F. ferme, a farm, occurring in the 13th cent.; see Littré; cf. F. à ferme, on lease. — Low Lat. firma, a farm; also, a fixed sum paid as rent (Ducange). Cf. Low Lat. firmitas, a security, surety. — Lat. firma, fem. of firmitas, firm, hence secure, fixed. See Firm. ¶ Ducange also gives firma, a feast, repast, but only as occurring in E. writers. This must be the A. S. feorm Latinised; we find the M. E. dat. case ferme in the phr. 'at ferme and at feste;' Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 131, l. 33. Confusion between the two words was easy. Der. farm-er, M. E. fermour, Chaucer, Leg. of Good Women, prol. 378; 'Fermoure, firmarius;' Prompt. Parv. The F. suffix -our shews the F. origin of the word.

FARRIER. Spelt ferroure in Anglo-F.; Stat. of the Realm, i. 311, an. 1351.

FARROW. Add: 'M. E. farzen; the pp. ivarzed occurs in the Avenbite of Inwynt, p. 61, l. 29; spelt iuervued, p. 204, l. 12.'

FATHERLAND. In Trench, Eng. Past and Present, 4th ed. p. 74, fatherland is said to be from G. vaterland. Surely this is a mistake. In his Curiosities of Literature, in the chapter on the History of New Words, I. D'Israeli distinctly tells us that he himself introduced the word into English, and that it was suggested to him by the Du. vaderland, at a time when he resided in Holland. He adds—'I have lived to see it adopted by Lord Byron and by Mr. Southey, and the word is now common.' It is therefore an English word formed in imitation of a Dutch one.

FATHOM. M. E. fadom in Tyrwhitt's spelling; fadme would be better; the Six-text edition has the readings fadme, fademe, fadmes, fapome. For the d sound, cf. M. E. fader, father.

FAWN (2). In Philip de Thauin, Bestiary, l. 703, the Anglo-F. feun means the young of the elephant.

FEALTY. The true O. F. form appears in the Anglo-F. fealte, fealty, Gaimar's Chron. l. 3719; Year-books of Edw. I., vol. ii. pp. 301, 307. The adj. feal occurs in the Lib. Custumarum, p. 215.

FEE. Anglo-F. fee, feo, Year-books of Edw. I., i. 5; Stat. Realm, i. 34 (1275); pl. fees, Lib. Custum. 459. This appears to be merely the A. S. feoh; M. E. fee, feo employed as a F. word. The O. F. forms are properly feu, fie, fieu (see Littré, s. v. fief), derived from O. H. G. fehu, fihu, cattle, property, which is cognate with A. S. feoh; so that, either way, the result is much the same.

FELL (2). Cf. Swed. fall, a fell, fur-skin; Icel. fall, a fell, skin.

FELL (3). Cf. Dan. fal, hideous, grim, horrid.

FELLAH, a peasant, tiller of the soil. (Arab.) In Webster; pl. fellahin. — Arab. fellāh (Devic), fallāh (Rich. Dict. p. 1098), a farmer, villager, peasant. — Arab. root falāh, to plough, till the ground.

FELLY. Cf. 'Cantus, felga;' Wright's Voc. i. 16, col. 1.

FELON, l. 9. In saying that 'the Irish feall is clearly cognate with L. fallere,' it is as well to add, 'because an initial s has been lost in both cases.' Otherwise, this would not be the case, since an initial Irish f = Lat. u, as in fean = L. uir. A reference to the article Fail (to which I duly refer), will shew this. I think we may mark the word as (F., — Low Lat., — C.).

FELT. Add: Swed. and Dan. felt.

FELUCCA. Dozy rejects the ordinary etymology of Span. feluca from Arab. fulk, and derives it rather from Arab. harrāqah, harrāqat, a kind of fire-ship; Rich. Dict. p. 560. Devic remarks that he considers this as not proven, and intimates that he prefers the usual etymology. See Dozy, Gloss. p. 265; Devic, Supp. to Littré.

FENCE. Cf. 'Fence, defence;' Palsgrave. And again, 'I fende (Lydgat), I defende, Je defens;' id.

FENUGREEK, a plant, cultivated for its seeds. (F., — L.) M. E. venecreke, Book of St. Albans, leaf c 4, back. — F. fenugrec, 'the herbe, or seed, fennigreeke;' Cot. — Lat. fenum Græcum, lit. 'Greek hay.'

FERRÉT (1). M. E. feret; Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 6, col. 2; and Cath. Anglicum. Spelt fyret; Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 31; ed. Arber, p. 79, l. 29. 'Fyret, a beest, furt;' Palsgrave.

FERRULE. Still earlier, we have E. vyroll, to explain F. uirolle, in Palsgrave.

FERRY. Add: Dan. færge, to ferry; also a ferry. + Swed. färja, the same.

FESS, a horizontal band, in heraldry. (F., — L.) Spelt fesse in Minshew, and in Cotgrave, s. v. face. The pl. faces occurs about A. D. 1500; see Queen Elizabeth's Academy, &c., ed. Furnivall, p. 98, l. 113. Florio (1598) translates Ital. fascia by 'bundles . . also fesses in armorie.' — O. F. fesse (Roquefort), spelt face in Cotgrave, and fasse in mod. F. — Lat. fascia, a girth; allied to fascis, a bundle; see Fascine.

FESTER. As to this difficult word, I would suggest that another point of resemblance between it and the A. S. fester is that the e was formerly long. It is spelt feestryn in Prompt. Parv., and Palsgrave has: 'I festyr as a sore dothe, Je apostume;' Though this wound be closed above, yet it feastreth byneth and is full of mater.' Next, as to sense, Palsgrave shews that it meant 'to gather' as an 'apostume,' or inward swelling. I think festered may be connected with the peculiar use of fostren, to kindle, glow, inflame, which arose out of the idea of fostering or cherishing a spark till it burst into flame. For this use, see P. Plowman, B. xvii. 207, 209; and again, in the Ancræn Riwle, p. 296, 'þe sparke . . lið and keccheð more fur, and fostreð hit forð, and waxeð from lesse to more vort al þet hus blasie,' i. e. the spark . . lies and catches more fire, and continually fosters it, and grows from less to more till all the house blaze. The metaphor of fostering presents no more difficulty than that of gathering, which is also used of a sore. Some suppose it possible that fester is allied to Icel. fasti, fire (Egilsson), Swed. dial. fästa, to kindle (Rietz); but these words do not account for the long e.

¶ Wedgwood refers us to Wallon s'éfister, to become corrupt, dialect of Aix fiesen, to begin to smell disagreeably; but the M. E. words allied to these are fyyst, 'stynk,' and fyistyn, 'Cacco, lrido' in Prompt. Parv.; and the mod. E. allied words are foist, ficheu, and fizz.

FETCH. In the Errata to the former edition, I adopted Dr. Stratmann's view, that the M. E. fecchen, to fetch, from A. S. feccan, is quite distinct from M. E. feten, later English fet, from A. S. fetian; and I drew the conclusion that my article at p. 207 is wrong. No doubt we find a great difference of form; on the one hand we have M. E. fecchen, pt. t. fehite, spelt feight in Rob. of Brunne (Stratmann), fehite in Layamon, 6460; A. S. feccan, Gen. xviii. 4, Luke xii. 20. On the other hand we have fet, to fetch (see Nares), though this form is commonly used as a pp., as in Shak. Hen. V. iii. i. 18; M. E. fetten, feten, pt. t. fette, Chaucer, C. T. Group G. 548, pp. fet, Group B. 667; A. S. fetian, Grein, l. 283 (as already given at p. 207). The only question is, whether the A. S. feccan and fetian are different words, or mere variants of the same word. On this point see an article by J. Platt in Anglia, v. 177, where the words are identified, fetian being taken as the older form, whence feccan (as representing *fechan, cc having the sound of ch in this instance). If this be so, my article is right; though I consider fetch as due to the pres. t. fecce rather than to the infin. feccan. ¶ Mätzner compares A. S. feccan with O. Fries. faka, to get ready; but this faka is parallel to A. S. facian, to wish to get, Ælfred, Orosius, b. iii. c. 11. § 10, from the sb. fac (stem fac), a space of time, hence prob. opportunity (Grein, i. 267); and if feccan = fetian, this comparison fails.

FEUD (1). Add: Dan. feide, a quarrel; feide, to war upon. + Swed. fegda, to make war against; fejda, a feud (Tauchnitz, Eng.-

Swed. portion), formerly spelt fegd (Widegren). ¶ This fegd is quite distinct from Swed. fegd, fatality, which is allied to E. fev.

FEUD (2). Dele all following Low Lat. feudum, a fief. I entirely give up this notion of making the adj. feudalis the older word. That the Low Lat. feudum is partly founded on O. H. G. fihu, feh, cattle, goods (cognate with E. fee), seems to be generally agreed upon. The difficulty is with the d, which some suppose to be intercalated; see fio in Diez, 4th ed. p. 140.

FEVER. Corssen derives Lat. febris (as if for *fer-bris) from the same root as fer-uere, to glow. But see Vanček.

FEY. Add: Swed. feg, cowardly, fegd, fatality, decree of fate; Dan. feig, cowardly.

FEZ, a red Turkish cap, without a brim. (F., — Morocco.) Borrowed by us from F. fez, the same; the word is also Turkish. So called because made at Fez, in Morocco; see Devic, Supp. to Littré.

FIEF; see remarks on Feud (2) above.

FILBERT. Wedgwood proposes filberde = fill the beard, i. e. husk; but the spelling fylberde in the Prompt. Parv. is a mere corruption of the earlier trisyllabic form in Gower (as cited). There is no more difficulty in 'Philibert's nut' than in the G. name meaning 'Lambert's nut.'

FILE. There is good authority for A. S. feol; see Grein, i. 294. 'Lima, feol;' Mone, Quellen, 367.

FILIBUSTER. Not (Span., — E.), but (Span., — E., — Du.) Wedgwood corrects this, and is certainly right. Whilst it is true that Span. filibote, fibote, is from E. fly-boat, it is also true that filibuster is another word altogether, and is merely the Span. pronunciation of E. freebooter, itself not a true E. word, but borrowed from Dutch. He refers us to Jal, Glossaire Nautique; see also Littré, s. v. fibustier, and Todd's Johnson, s. v. freebooter. Wedgwood says: 'Oexmelin, who was himself one of the buccaneers whose history he relates, expressly says that they gave themselves the name of fibustier from the English word filibuster, which signifies rover.' He then cites the passage, with a reference to vol. i. p. 22. By the word fibuster is certainly meant freebooter; the change of r to l being extremely common. Besides, the F. form was once fribustier (Todd and Littré). See further under Freebooter, p. 806. Monlau, in his Span. Etym. Dict., rightly derives filibote, fibote from E. flyboat, but filibustero from the Du. vrijbuit (the E. freebooter being an intermediate form).

FIN. Stratmann gives five references for M. E. finne. 'Fynne of a fische, pinna;' Prompt. Parv.

FINE. M. E. fin (with long i); written fyn, K. Alisaunder, 2657; in the passage cited, from P. Plowman, B. ii. 9, the form is fineste, superlative.

FINIAL. Cf. 'every butterace fined [ended] with finials;' Will of Hen. VI.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 302. Anglo-F. finols, pl., Will of Earl of Essex (1361); id. p. 47.

FIR. The Swed. is fur or fura; furu is only used in composition, and in oblique cases (J. N. Grönlund). Furu is the only form given in Widegren (1788).

FIRKIN. 'Kilderkyn and firken;' Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 85.

FIRM (2), a partnership. (Port., — L.) 'Firm, the name or names under which any house of trade is established;' Ash's Dict., 1775. This is the proper sense; it alludes to the signature of the house. — Port. firma, 'a man's hand to a writing; a firm;' Vieyra. — Port. fimar, to make firm; hence, to sign. — Port. firm, adj. firm. — L. firmus, firm; see Firm. ¶ If the word be not Port., it must be Span.; from Span. firma, a sign manual, signature, derived in the same way from fimar, vb., which is from firm, adj. Mahn is clearly wrong in citing 'Ital. firma,' as the Ital. spelling of the adj. is fermo, and the sb. ferma merely means an engagement.

FITCHEW. The nom. sing. is spelt fiches (perhaps by mistake for ficheu) in the Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 4, back; the pl. is fecheus, id. leaf b 7, back. The pl. ficheux occurs A. D. 1438, in Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 110. The form fitchew answers to Walloon fichau, a polecat (Sigart). Hexham gives fisse, visse, 'a weasel or polcat.'

FLAKE. Cf. Swed. dial. flag, a thin slice, also spelt flak (Rietz); Dan. sneeflage, snow-flake; sneeflokker, small flakes of snow.

FLAMINGO. See N. and Q. 6 S. ii. 326, 450, 478; iii. 35, 75, 110, 131; especially at the last reference. It is remarkable that, in Span. flamenco, the -enco is not a usual Span. suffix. The name seems to have arisen in Provence, where the bird was called flamant or flambant, i. e. flaming (from its colour). We even find flamman, i. e. flamingoes, in English; cf. An Eng. Garner, vii. 358 (1689); and in Urquhart's Rabelais, II. i., the bird is called a flaman (Davies). This Prov. flamant must have been confused with F. Flamand, a Fleming, a native of Flanders, because the Span. flamenco and Port. flamengo properly mean a Fleming. In Bluteau's Port. Dict. (1713), we find flamengo, a native of Flanders, and flamengo or flamenco, a flamingo, which he wrongly imagines to have come from Flanders, whereas it is abundant chiefly in Sicily, Spain, and the S. of France. See Mr. Pictou's article in N. and Q. (as above). The word may be marked as (Span. or Port., = Prov., = L.). Flamingo occurs in E. ab. A.D. 1565, in An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 134; and again in 1582, id. 257.

FLARE. Note also Swed. flasa, to frolic, sport; answering to E. dial. to flare up.

FLATTER. It may be better to consider this as a Low G. form. — O. Du. flatteren, fleiteren, 'to flatter or to soothe up one'; Hexham. Allied to Icel. flaðra, to fawn upon. The O. F. flater is, of course, closely allied, but may likewise be considered as of Low G. origin. I still think that the bases FLAK and FLAT are equivalent; and that the forms cited from Swedish are to the point.

FLAVOUR. Rather (F., = Low L., = L.) than (Low L., = L.). The word is found in M. E.; the pl. flavours (= flavores), odours, occurs in Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, A. 87. [It is quite a mistake to suppose that the u (between a and o) can possibly be a vowel here, as some seem to imagine.] — O. F. flavours, given by Roquefort with the sense of 'odour.' This settles the etymology from Low Lat. flavor, though more light is desired as to these O. F. and Low Lat. words. It is certain that Wyntoun (who rimes it with savour) uses the same word in a passage where the Scottish scribe (as usual) has absurdly used w for v. 'Of that rute the kynd flavour [read savour], As flouris havand that savour [read savour], He had, and held; Wynt. ix. 26. 107 (Jamieson, s. v. floure). In other passages a confusion with M. E. flayre (Morte Arth. 772) may have taken place, this word being from O. F. flairer, as already noted; cf. Walloon flair, a bad smell (Sigart). But this confusion does not really affect the etymology, which in this case is determined by the form.

FLAWN, a kind of custard. (F., = O. H. G.) 'Fill ouen full of flawnes;' Tusser, Husb. § 90. st. 5. M. E. flawn; 'Pastees and flawnes,' Havelok, 644. — F. flan, O. F. flaon. Cotgrave gives flans, 'flawns, custards, egg-pies; also, round plates of metall;' and flaons, 'round plates of metall.' [Cf. Span. flaon, flawn, plate of metal; Ital. fiadone, 'a kind of flavne,' Florio; Low Lat. flado, flato, a flavn.] — O. H. G. flado, a broad flat cake, flawn; M. H. G. vlade; G. fladen, a kind of pan-cake.

β. So named from its flatness; Scheler cites Walloon flate, with the same sense as G. kuk-fladen, a piece of cow-dung; cf. O. Du. vlade, 'a flavne;' Hexham. 'As flat as a flawn' is a common old proverb (Hazlitt). The form flat has only been preserved in the Scandinavian tongues; the O. H. G. flado comes very near the Dan. flad, flat; the Low Lat. flato answers to the Icel. flatr, Swed. flat. The Lat. placenta, a cake, is named for a similar reason; see PLACENTA. (So Scheler, Diez, Weigand.)

FLEA. The pl. flæan (= Shropshire E. flen) occurs in A. S. Leechdoms, i. 264, l. 14, i. 266, l. 2.

FLEE. Dr. Stratmann remarks that flee may be the M. E. fleon; and the pt. fledde requires an infinitive fleden, for which we actually find fledde, Myrc. Duties of a Parish Priest, l. 1374. But I suspect that this infinitive was coined from fledde, and that fledde was suggested by the Icel. flýði, pt. t. of flýja, to fly. In any case, flee is but a variant of fly.

FLEECE. It is spelt fiese (neut. accus.), with the various readings flys (= flys) and fleos, in Laws of Ine, § 69, in Thorpe, Anc. Laws, i. 146, note 23.

FLEER. Under fina, Rietz gives fira as an equivalent form in Swed. dialects.

FLIRT. Note also the A. S. glosses: 'fraude, colludio, flearde, getwance;' Mone, Quellen, p. 362; 'deliramenta, gedofu, gefleard, id. p. 340; 'induticans, luxurians, tigende, broddiende, tolcedende, fleardiende;' id. p. 356. Also the cognate Swed. flärd, 'deceit, artifice, vanity, frivolousness; fara med flärd, to use deceitful dealing' (Tauchnitz Dict.). This is plain speaking as to what to flirt means.

FLOAT. The pres. pt. flotigende of the rare A. S. verb flotian, to float (as a ship), occurs in the Parker MS. of the A. S. Chronicle, anno 1031. The verb flotian, to float, and the sb. floa, a ship, are both derived from flot-en, pp. of the strong verb fléotan, already given.

FLOG. Certainly (L.); from flagellare. This appears at once by the fact that the Bremen Wörterbuch gives both flegel and flogger in the sense of 'flail;' and flegel, like E. flail, is merely from flagellum, not a word of Teut. origin. We may therefore confidently refer Low G. flogger and E. flog to the same source.

FLOUNCE (2). Cf. 'en la flounce du dit bacyn,' on the rim of the said basin, Will of Eleanor Bohun (1399); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 182.

FLUE (2). The Low G. flog or flok means precisely flue or floating down; 'so ligt as een Flog' = as light as a feather. But the author of the Bremen Wörterbuch is quite wrong in deriving it from flegen, to fly; and, indeed, contradicts himself at the same moment by connecting it with F. floc, which is plainly right.

FLUSH (1). M. E. flosch, a flood, or flow of blood, Alexander, ed. Stevenson, 2049. We there read that, in a battle, there was so much bloodshed that 'foles [foals, horses] ferd in the flosches to the fetelakis.'

FLUSH (3), level, even. I think this is certainly from Flush (1). We have, in Cotgrave, en flux, upon the increase; hence flush, adj. in its prime, in full vigour, as in Shak. Hamlet. iii. 3. 81; Ant. i. 4. 52. Hence it obtained the sense of 'good, right, correct,' as in Hazlitt, O. Plays, ii. 78, where Hypocrisy says he will so contrive that 'all should be flush that ever I did.' The senses seem to have been, in full flow, in one's prime, excellent, right; whence the senses of just, even, may have resulted.

FLUTE. M. E. floute, sb.; spelt flowte, floyte, Prompt. Parv.; Chaucer, Ho. of Fame, iii. 133. The Low Lat. flauta is merely Latinised from the French. The orig. word seems to have been the O. F. flüeter, put for flatur = flature.

FLY. In the sense of carriage for hire, it seems to have been first applied to 'a nouvelle kind of four-wheel vehicles drawn by a man and an assistant . . . they are denominated flys, a name first given by a gentleman at the Pavilion [at Brighton] upon their first introduction in 1816;' Wright's Brighton Ambulator, 1818, quoted in Davies, Supp. Glossary. I think that the reason for the name was from the notion of its flying along, just as a fly-boat was named for the same reason; or it may have been simply short for fly-boat; the result being much the same. For a curious piece of evidence in this direction, see a picture of a public vehicle called 'The Velocitas, or Malton, Driffield and Hull fly-boat,' which was made in the shape of a boat with awnings above it, in Hone's Table-book, ii. 559. The description of it is dated Oct. 27, 1827. The remark (in the list of derivatives from fly) that filibuster is from fly-boat, is wrong; see note on Filibuster (p. 804 above).

FOAM. The A. S. fám answers better to M. H. G. feim, foam, given under the form veim in Wackernagel. Cf. also Russ. piena, foam. The A. S. fám, Russ. piena, Skt. phena, seem to be due to a root ✓SPI; the L. spuma is explained by Fick, iii. 169, as standing for spoima. May not ✓SPI have been a by-form of ✓SPU?

FOIL (2). Cf. Anglo-F. foilles, leaves, Stat. of the Realm, i. 219; le foile, the leaf of a book, Cursor Mundi, part 5, p. 5 (at the beginning).

FOLD. The word fold, used as a sb., in the sense of sheep-fold, is not in any way allied to the verb to fold. It occurs as A. S. fald, in John, x. 1; but this is contracted from an older form falod; see Leo's Glossar. Perhaps falod meant 'protected by palings,' and is connected with Icel. fjöl (gen. fjalar), a thin board, plank.

FOP. M. E. foppe, a foolish fellow, Prompt. Parv.; fop, Cov. Mysteries, p. 205; M. E. fobbe, Piers Plowman, C. iii. 193.

FOREJUDGE, to deprive a man of a thing by the judgment of a court. (F., = L.) Still in use as a law-term, and quite distinct from the hybrid word fore-judge, to judge beforehand. Better spelt forjurge; indeed, Blount's Nomolexicon (1691) has: 'forjudged the court, is when an officer of any court is banished or expelled the same.' — F. forjurer, 'to judge or condemn wrongfully, also to disinherit, deprive, dispossess of;' Cotgrave. — O. F. for-, prefix, out, outside; and juger, to judge. The O. F. for- is short for fors = Lat. foris, outside. See Foreclose, and Judge.

FORESTALL. The explanation given is incorrect, though the etymology is practically right, as the word is really compounded of fore and stall. There is no A. S. verb foresteallian, but there is an A. S. sb. forsteal or foresteal; and this is the real origin of the M. E. and E. verb. It is spelt forsteal, with the sense of 'obstruction,' in the Laws of Ethelred, v. § 31, and vi. § 38; see Thorpe, Anc. Laws, i. 312, 324. In the Laws of Hen. I (id. i. 586) we read that 'forestel est, si quis ex transverso incurrat, vel in via expectet et assalliat inimicum suum.' The etymology is from fore, before, and steall, a stall, also a placing, setting; and foresteall is lit. 'a placing of oneself in the way,' or the causing of an obstruction, or the crossing of a man's path. In Ælfric's Hom. ii. 242, Thorpe translates foresteall by 'a rescue;' it is, more literally, opposition, antagonism. In an old Glossary, quoted in the Liber Albus, iii. 455, the M. E. forstal is said to mean 'estupure de chemin,' i. e. a stopping up of the way. From the sense of getting in another's way arose the commercial meaning of the word. See further in Schmidt, A. S. Laws, Glossary, s. v. forsteal.

FORGE. The old sense is curiously illustrated by the mention of Joseph, Mary's husband, as being 'a forger of trees, that is to seie, a wrighte;' Wiclif, Works, ed. Arnold, i. 19.

FORMIDABLE. Prof. Postgate suggests the ✓GHAR, a simpler form of ✓GHARS, to bristle; for which see Horror. This gives to ✓GHAR the sense 'to bristle,' as distinct from ✓GHAR, to grind. This is probable; and is well supported by the Lat. ēr, for her, a hedgehog, Gk. χῆρ. See Urchin, which ought, accordingly, to be referred to ✓GHAR, to bristle, not to the longer form GHARS.

FORTNIGHT. The phrase occurs in the following: 'swá hwær swá bið se mōna fēowertýne nihta eald,' whenever the moon is a fortnight old, (lit. old of fourteen nights, nihta being the gen. pl.); Scredunga, ed. Bouterwek, p. 25, l. 27; Popular Treatises on Science, ed. Wright, p. 6, l. 24. — W. M. (Boun).

FOUNT (1). After this word, insert 'Fount (2); see Font (2)'. FRAMPOLD. Add that W. fframfol is compounded of W. ffrom, testy, and ffol, foolish; -fol is not a mere suffix. (A. L. Mayhew).

FRANION, a gay idle companion. (F., — L.) 'Franton, a gay idle fellow; see Heywood's Edw. IV. p. 45; Peele, i. 207; Halliwell. See further in Nares; also Dodsley's O. Plays, iv. 60, vi. 179. I adopt the suggestion in Nares, that it is equivalent to F. faineant, 'an idle, drowsy, listless, slothful lusk; . . . also, a lewd companion, loose fellow;' Cot. The agreement in sense is so minutely exact that I think we need look no further. Nares remarks that the r is lacking, but that is no great objection when we remember that the r is intrusive in g-r-oom, bride-g-r-oom, part-r-idge, cart-r-idge, co-r-poral, vag-r-ant, and hoar-r-se. Perhaps our dramatists were thinking of the infin. faire-neant. The form of the word certainly appears to be French. — F. fait neant, i. e. he does nothing; cf. vaurien = vaut rien, he is worth nothing. F. fait = Lat. facit, 3 pers. sing. of facere, to do; see Fact. F. neant (Cot.), O. F. nient, is der. from Lat. ne, not, and ent-em, acc. of ens, being, substance; see No and Entity; (Scheler). Cf. Ital. far niente, to do nothing.

FRANKALMOIGN, the name of the tenure by which most church lands are held. (F.; — O. H. G. and L., — Gk.) In Blackstone, Comment. b. ii. c. 4. Spelt frankalmoin in Blount's Nomolicon; lit. 'free alms.' — F. franc, free; and almoine, Anglo-F. variant of O. F. almosne, mod. F. aumône, alms. See Frank and Almoner.

FRANKINCENSE. M. E. frank encens, Mandeville's Trav. p. 120. 'Frankensence, franc encens;' Palsgrave.

FRAY (1), an affray. Cf. Anglo-F. affrai, a breach of the peace, Lib. Custumarum, p. 684; affrai de la pees, the same, Stat. Realm, i. 258, an. 1328; affrei, id. 185, an. 1322; &c. See remarks on Affray above, shewing that the etymology is from the Teut. fridu, peace.

FREEBOOTER, a rover, pirate. (Du.) Bacon, in his Life of Hen. VII., ed. Lumby, p. 129, l. 28, says that Perkin Warbeck's men were chiefly 'strangers born, and most of them base people and freebooters.' These strangers were mostly Flemings; see p. 112, l. 11, &c. In a letter dated 1597, in the Sidney State Papers, ii. 78, is a mention of 'the freebutters of Flushenge;' Todd's Johnson. — Du. vrijbutter, a freebooter. — Du. vrijbuiten, to rob, plunder. — Du. vrijbuit, plunder, lit. 'free booty.' The Du. vrij is cognate with E. free; and buit is allied to booty. See Free and Booty. Doublet, filibuster (see above).

FRICASSEE. Can F. fricasser be derived from Ital. fracassare, to break in pieces? See Fracas.

FRIEZE (1). 'Thycke mantels of fryse they weare;' Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 82, l. 14 (A.D. 1528); spelt frese and fryse in Paston Letters, i. 83 (about A.D. 1449). Cf. 'a gowne of grene frese,' occurring A.D. 1418; Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 37, l. 1. Palsgrave has: Fryse, rough cloth, drap frise. See note on Friz (below).

FRINGE. The O. F. fringe actually occurs, Dialogue, Gregoire lo Pape, p. 65 (Lacume). The Wallachian form is frimbie, also fringhie (Cihac). 'Fring, frenge;' Palsgrave.

FRITH, an enclosure, forest, wood. (E.) It occurs as a place-name in Chapel-le-Frith, Derbyshire, and is common in Kent in the names of woods; but is obsolete. Drayton has: 'Both in the tufty frith and in the mossy fell,' Polyolbion, song 17. M. E. frith, peace, Layamon, l. 2549; Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft, p. 99; also in the sense of enclosed land, enclosure, park for hunting, forest, wood; thus in Layamon, 1432, where the older MS. speaks of hunting in the king's frith [friðe], the later MS. speaks of hunting in the king's park [parc]. See numerous examples in Mätzner, and cf. A. S. frid-gæard, an enclosed space, lit. 'peace-yard' or 'safety-yard,' for which see Thorpe, Anc. Laws, ii. 298; also O. Swed. fridgård, an enclosure for animals (Ihre). — A. S. frid, peace; freobu, freobu, frido, peace, security, asylum; Grein, i. 343, 347, 348. + Icel. fridr, peace, security, personal security; Dan. fred; Swed. fred, O. Swed. frid; Du. vrede, peace, quiet; G. friede, O. H. G. fridu, frida. All from a pair of common Teut. types FRITHU and FRITHA; see Fick, iii. 190; formed with subst. suffix -THU or -THA from the base FRI, to love, rejoice, please. — ✓PRI, to love; whence also Free, Friend, q. v. β. The orig. sense of the root was that of loving, pleasing; thence we pass to that of peace, rest, quiet enjoyment, security; lastly, to that of a place of security. The important Teut. word frith implied also the safety of the individual, and 'the king's peace;' to break it was to be guilty of an affray, or violation of the peace; hence Affray and Fray. Hence also the M. H. G. berc-vrit, that which preserves security, whence our Belfry. Borrowed forms are W. ffrid, park, forest; Irish frith, a wild mountainous place; Gael. frith, a forest for deer.

FRITILLARY, a genus of liliaceous plants. (L.) In Phillips, ed. 1706. Called Fretellaria in Bacon, Essay 46 (Of Gardens). So called because the corolla is shaped something like a dice-box. Englished from late Lat. fritillaria, coined from L. fritillus, a dice-box. Root uncertain.

FRIZ. See Catholicon Anglicum, ed. Herrtage, p. 58, note 1, p. 142, note 2. The quotations there given render the derivation of friz from frieze (1) absolutely certain.

FRUITION. But the Lat. fruitio occurs in the works of St. Jerome; see Lewis and Short. (A. L. M.)

FRY (2), spawn of fishes. But the F. frai (spelt fray in Cotgrave) is a verbal sb. from frayer = L. fricare; see Scheler, &c. Thus, notwithstanding the remarkable coincidence in form and sense between E. fry and F. frai, there is absolutely no etymological connection. It adds one more to the number of such instructive instances. Still the E. fry is rather (F., — Scand.) than (Scand.) We find the Anglo-F. forms fry, frie, in the Lib. Albus, pp. 507, 508.

FUEL. The Anglo-F. form is fewelle, Lib. Albus, p. 337.

FUGITIVE. M. E. fugitif, Mandeville's Trav. p. 66.

FUMBLE. There is also Swed. fumla, to fumble, answering exactly to the E. word.

FUN. In N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 77, a correspondent endeavours to shew that fun was in use 'before 1724' by quoting two lines without any reference whatever! (The etymology there given from M. E. fonnen can hardly be right; as I have already said.) Its Celtic origin is further suggested by the expression 'sic fun ye never saw' in what professes to be the original version of 'The Battle of Harlaw,' formerly sung in Aberdeenshire. For this ballad, see N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 394, where it was first printed, in 1865.

FUND. Actually spelt fond; Eng. Garner, vi. 387; ab. 1677.

FUNNEL. Prob. not (W.), but (F., — L.) The word is older than the 16th cent. M. E. fonel, Prompt. Parv.; fonel, funell, Cursor Mundi, 3306; funelle, Cath. Angl. The explanation from W. ffynel, given in Mätzner, is, as Wedgwood says, very unsatisfactory. Fonel probably represents an O. F. *fonel or *fonil, whence the Bret. founil, a funnel for pouring in liquids, is prob. merely borrowed. And this may well be from late Lat. fundibulum (Lewis and Short), which is merely a clipped form of the proper Lat. word, viz. infundibulum. Roquefort gives an O. F. enfouille, which he equates to Prov. enfouil and Lat. infundibulum; but it looks very much as if he has made a mistake, and that the right O. F. word was enfouille (with n, not u). I now think, with Wedgwood, that this F. origin is far more likely, notwithstanding the shortening of fundibulum to *fonil which is thus involved. This O. F. word for 'funnel,' as derived from fundere, was superseded in F. by the word which we now spell tunnel. The change of sense from 'pipe to pour in by' to 'flue' or chimney is just what we should expect, and occurs again in the very case of Tunnel, q. v. (p. 668). As to W. ffynel, it is merely the M. E. word borrowed.

FUR. Cf. Anglo-F. forure, furrure, fur trimmings, Lib. Albus, pp. 225, 279. This corresponds to M. E. furrur, fur trimmings (Fifty Earliest E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 54, l. 6), and to F. fou-rure, 'fur, furring, skins to fur with,' Cot.; and to Low Lat. foderatura, fur. Cf. Low Lat. foderatus, furred, fodera, fur (A.D. 1295), the latter being a mere Latinised form from the Low German. Besides the Icel. fóðr, we have O. Du. voeder, (1) fodder, (2) 'furre, or lynning,' Hexham. Cotgrave explains fourré by 'furred, sheathed, cased.' Thus the etymology cannot well be doubted. We even find Anglo-F. feur for 'fodder;' Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 34.

FURBISH. The pp. fourboshid (better fourbished) occurs as early as in Wyclif, Works, ed. Arnold, i. 224, l. 4.

FURNISH. The Anglo-F. form furnir, to perform, occurs in the Life of Edw. Confessor, ed. Luard, l. 1443.

FURROW. Add: Dan. fure, a furrow, also as verb, to furrow. + Swed. fåra, the same.

FURZE. The comparison with Gael preas is probably wrong.

FUSS. Cf. Swed. dial. fus, eager, Swed. framfusig, pert, saucy. The Swed. verb fuska, to bungle, Dan. fuske, to bungle at, seems to belong here.

FUTTOCKS. Also spelt foot-hooks in Bailey, ed. 1745.

FYLFOT, a peculiarly formed cross, each arm being bent at right angles, always in the same direction. (E.) Also called a rebated cross. See Fairholt, Dict. of Terms in Art; and Boutell's Heraldry. Supposed to be (as is probable) a corruption of A. S. fier-fôte, variant of fyder-fôte, four-footed, in allusion to its shape. The change from r to l is common. Cf. Swed. fyrfootad, four-footed. The A. S. fyder-, i. e. 'four,' is only found in compounds; the usual form is feđer; cf. Goth. fidwor. See Four and Foot.

GAD (2). Wedgwood explains this by 'to run hither and thither without persistent aim, like cattle terrified by the hum of the gad-fly.' He cites the Ital. assillo, 'a sharpe goade,' Florio; and assillare, 'to bite with a horseflic; also to leap and skip furiously, as oxen do, when they are stung and bitten with flies.' If this be so, then gad, v. is from gad, sb., just as the Icel. gadda is from gaddr; only it was formed in England. It makes very little difference to the etymology. See quotations in Richardson and Johnson.

GAFF. M. E. gaffe, a hook, abt. A. D. 1308; Reliq. Antiq. ii. 174.

GALINGALE, the pungent root of a plant. (F., = Span., = Arab.) M. E. galingale, Chaucer, C. T. 383. = O. F. *galingal, not authorised, but it must have occurred, as the form garingal is common, and the usual later F. form is galangue, as in Cotgrave. = Span. galanga, the same. = Arab. khalanjān, galingale; Rich. Dict. p. 625. Said to be of Pers. origin. See Devic, Supp. to Littré; Marco Polo, ed. Yule, ii. 181.

GALLANT, l. g. The form of the base of Goth. gailjan is rather GIL.

GALLIAS. Not (F.), but (F., = Ital.).

GALORE, abundantly, in plenty. (C.) Also spelt gelore, gilore in Jamieson, and galore in Todd's Johnson. 'Galloor, plenty, North;' Grose (1790). = Irish goleor, sufficiently; where go is a particle which, when prefixed to an adjective, renders it an adverb, and leor, adj., means sufficient; Gael. gu leor, or gu leoir, which is precisely the same. Cf. Irish lia, more, allied to L. plus.

GALT, also GAULT, a series of beds of clay and marl. (Scand.) A modern geological term. Prov. E. galt, clay, brick-earth, Suffolk (Halliwell). [Of Scand. origin; the spelling gault is phonetic.] = Norweg. gald, hard ground, a place where the ground is trampled hard by frequent treading, also a place where snow is trodden hard; Icel. gald, hard snow, also spelt galdr, gaddr. ¶ In no way allied to Icel. gaddr (for *gasdr), a goad.

GAMMON (1). M. E. gambon, Book of St. Albans, leaf f 2, back. This verifies the etymology.

GAMUT. Strictly, the word is (Hybrid; F., = L., = Gk., = Phœnician; and L.) The Greek γάμμα stands for γάμλα (the pronunciation in the Mishna, see Fürst); and is from the Phœnician word corresponding to Heb. gāmāl, a camel. Cf. Heb. gimel, the name of the third Heb. letter. See Smith's Dict. of the Bible, iii. 1797. = A. L. M. Cf. 'gammouthe, gamme;' Palsgrave. 'Game, f. gamut;' Cotgrave.

GANG (2), to go. (Scand.) In Barbour's Bruce, ii. 276, iv. 193, x. 421. = Icel. ganga, to go; see Go.

GAR (2). Vigfusson treats the Icel. görr, adj. skilled, ready made, dressed, which he gives at p. 225, col. 2, § F, as all one with görr, the pp. of göra. In other Teut. languages they are distinct, as shewn by Fick, iii. 102. The connection with Yare and Gear is, in any case, certain.

GARDEN. Section γ. In the passage referred to, Brachet speaks only of the Latin z, not of the O. H. G. z. But see also § 27, where he explains that the O. H. G. consonants were subject to the same laws as the Latin consonants. The Prov. form giard-ina suggests that the suffix may be considered as Romance (see Diez).

GARNET. Cf. Anglo-F. gernet, a little grain of wheat, Philip de Thaur, Bestiary, l. 453. Evidently for *gernet, and a derivative of Lat. grænum.

GARTER. Anglo-F. gartier, Stat. of the Realm, i. 380, an. 1363. Walloon gartier (Sigart).

GAS. The original passage in which this word first occurs is cited in N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 111. 'Gas et Blas nova quidem sunt nomina a me introducta eo quod illorum cognitio veteribus fuit ignota; attamen inter initia physica Gas et Blas necessarium locum obtinent;' Van Helmont, Ortus Medicinæ, Amsterdam, 1648, p. 73.

GATE. This article is not sufficiently explicit. There are really two words of this form, close related; one being E., the other of Scand. origin. They should be thus distinguished. A. Mod. E. gate, a door, opening, M. E. gate, yate, A. S. geat, cognate with Icel. gat, Du. gat; from the common Teut. type GATA, a neuter noun. B. Mod. E. gate, chiefly in the North, a way, path, street; Icel. gata, Swed. gata, Dan. gade, cognate with Goth. gatuwo, G. gasse, a way, street; from the common Teut. type GATWAN, a feminine noun.

The distinction appears in the Lowl. Scotch 'gang yer gate, and steek the yett ahint ye.' (Suggested by A. L. Mayhew; I had already made the distinction, but it is worth while to make it still clearer.)

GAUGE. We find gaugez, pp. pl., gauged, and gaugour, a gauger, in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 331, an. 1353. The O. F. gauger, to gauge, precisely answers to a Low Lat. form *jalagiare, from the sb. jalagium. Corresponding to F. jale or gale (see Gallon) is the Low Lat. galum or galus, a gallon, measure of wine.

GAUNT. I explain the disputed word arm-gaunt to mean 'sleender-armed,' the arm being the technical name for the upper part of a horse's fore-leg. It is an epithet implying praise, not depreciation.

GAUNTLET (2). In the phr. 'to run the gauntlet,' we have a corruption of an older gantlope. It appears as run the gantlope in Bailey (1735), Kersey (1715), Philips (1706), and Blount (1674). Bailey correctly defines it as 'to run through a company of soldiers, standing on each side, making a lane, with each a switch in his hand to scourge the criminal.' Widegren's Swed. Dict. (1788) gives 'gatlupp, s. gantelope, gantlet; löpa gatlupp, to run the gantelope.' See further under Gantlet (2), p. 227.

GAVELKIND. Not (C.), but (E.) The likeness of the Irish word cited (which should be spelt gabalcined) to the E. gavelkind appears to be accidental. For some history of it, see Elton's Tenures of Kent (1867); and compare the term gafol-land, in Kemble, Saxons in England (1849), i. 320; Codex Diplomaticus, i. p. lxi. We find the form gavelkynde in the Statutes of the Realm, i. 218, 223, before A. D. 1327; and Elton cites a far older form gavelkende from an ancient grant of A. D. 1043, which exhibits the Kentish peculiarity of putting kende for kynde. (Cf. Kentish pet, a pit; A. S. pyt.) The corresponding A. S. form would be gafol-cynd, i. e. 'condition of tribute,' compounded of gafol, tribute, and cynd, sort, kind, condition. Both of these are common words, and gafol enters into several compounds, such as gafol-land, land let on rent, gafol-penig, tribute-penny, &c. As to A. S. cynd, see Kind (2).

β. I have so far considered gafol as an E. word; but it is doubtful whether the word is Teutonic. The G. gaffel, tribute, is not an old word; and this, as well as A. S. gafol, cannot be separated from the Low Lat. gabulum, gabulum, tribute, whence F. gabelle, Ital. and Port. gabella, Span. and Prov. gabela, tribute, tax. Either these are all derivatives from the pt. t. of the Teutonic verb to give (as seen in Goth. gaf, gave), or we must look elsewhere. Devic, following Dozy, says that the Ital. form was sometimes written cabella and caballa, and Ducange gives the same forms in his Dict. of Low Latin. Hence g is thought to be a mere substitution for an older c; which suggests a derivation from a Semitic source, viz. Arab. qabāla, said by Devic to mean 'impost' or 'tax,' though Richardson (Dict. p. 1112) only gives the senses 'contract, deed, written agreement, bail, bond.' The antiquity of the term in English renders an Arab. derivation rather difficult. See Devic, Supp. to Littré; Diez, 4th ed. p. 720. ¶ In any case, the derivation from the Celtic must be given up, as the technical Irish term gabalcined has nothing to do with 'rent,' but meant originally 'the branch (gabalc) of a sept or tribe (cined), then the share of land falling to such a branch.' (Kindly communicated by Dr. W. K. Sullivan.)

GENET. M. E. genete, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 31, ed. Arber, p. 79, l. 29. The fur of the genet was known in England as early as 1418; see Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 36, note 7.

GERM. Vanček refers it to ✓KAR, to make, which seems better. This allies it to L. creare, &c.

GERMANDER, a plant. (F., = Ital., = L., = Gk.) In Bacon, Essay 46 (Of Gardens). 'Germandre, herbe, germandré;' Palsgrave. = F. germandrée, germander (Cotgrave). = Ital. calamandrea, germander (by the common change from l to r). A corrupt form of L. chamædrys, wall-germander, Pliny (White). = Gk. χαμαίδρυς, germander, lit. ground-tree, or low-growing tree. = Gk. χαμαί, on the ground; δρῦς, tree. See Chameleon and Tree.

GHASTLY. The ref. to Grein (i. 374) is wrong; the word in Grein is gastlic, lit. 'guest-like,' hence, hospitable, &c. The word ghastly does not appear in A. S.; if it did, it would be gástlic (which occurs only in the sense of ghostly). It is from gæstan, to vex, Grein, i. 374, of which the orig. sense was prob. to terrify, as in M. E. gasten, to scare, which see in Stratmann. The rest of the article is, I think, correct, since A. S. gæst-represents a Teut. stem gaist-.

GHOST. Add: Swed. gast, evil spirit, ghost; gastar skola där springa, 'satyrs shall dance there,' Isaiah xiii. 21 (Widegren). The form of the root is Teut. GIS = Aryan GHIS, but the sense of the root is unknown; it is uncertain whether we may connect it with Goth. us-gais-jan, to terrify, from a root of the same form (Fick, iii. 107), whence E. ghastly, aghost.

GIAOUR. Add: another view is that the word is of Semitic origin. Thus Zenker, in his Dictionnaire Turc-Arabe-Persan, gives Turk. kâfir, an infidel, adding 'vulgarly jaur.' It would thus appear that Giaour is a Turkish corruption of the Arab. kāfir, whence the Turk. kāfir is plainly borrowed. Rich. Arab. Dict. has kāfir, denying God, an infidel, pagan, impious wretch. Cf. Arab. kafr, being impious, from the root kafara, to hide, conceal; Rich. Dict. pp. 1163, 1195. See N. and Q. 6 S. ii. 252.

GIBBERISH. Spelt gibridge, Dodsley's O. Plays, ed. Hazlitt, viii. 75; Cotgrave, s. v. bagois. We may explain gibber as a frequentative of gibe, q. v. It makes but little difference.

GIBBET. It seems reasonable to connect this word with Swed. dial. gippa, to jerk; for which see Jib (2).

GIFT. Add: cf. Dan. gifte, to give away in marriage, giftes, to be married, tilgift, something given in addition; Swed. tillgift, pardon, hemgift, a dowry.

GIN (3). Perhaps (Du., -F., -L.) I think it probable that the word geneva was not taken directly from F. genevre, but from Du. jenever, meaning both 'juniper' and 'gin'; see Sewel. This Du. jenever is, however, merely borrowed from F., so that it comes to much the same thing. Cf. Theriaque des Alemans, the juice of gineper berries extracted according unto art; Cotgrave. See Palmer, Folk-Etymology.

GINGER. The earliest forms are A. S. gingiber, gingifer, borrowed directly from Latin; see Gloss. to A. S. Leechdoms, vol. iii.

GIRAFFE. Not (F., -Span., -Arab., -Egyptian), but (F., -Span., -Arab.) The Egyptian origin is suggested by Mahn, who derives it from Egyptian soraphé, which he explains by 'long neck.' Dr. Wright tells me there is no foundation for this supposition.

GIRD (1). Add: Swed. giorda, to gird.

GIRTH. Add: Swed. giord, a girth.

GLADEN, GLADDEN, a plant, Iris pseudacorus. (L.) Spelt gladon in Palsgrave; gladone in Prompt. Parv.; see Way's note, and Turner's Names of Herbes. A. S. gladene; Cockayne's Leechdoms, Gloss. to vol. ii. Englished from Lat. gladiolus, 'a sword-lily'; Lewis and Short. -Lat. gladius, a sword; see Gladiator.

GLAMOUR. See Gramarye below.

GLEAN. Cf. the A. S. gloss: 'manipulos, gilman;' Mone, Quellen, p. 379. See also Catholicon Anglicum, p. 158, note 4.

GLEEK (1), a scoff, a jest. (Scand.) It means a 'scoff' in Shak. 1 Hen. VI. iii. 2. 123; 'a glance of the eye' in Beaum. and Fletcher, Maid in the Mill, ii. 2. See examples in Nares. It is the same as Lowl. Sc. glaiik, a glance of the eye, a deception, a trick, cheat, toy; cf. glaiik, verb, to trifle with. I suppose it to be merely the same word as Lowl. Sc. laik, a stake at play, play of swords, North E. lake, a play, a game, with the prefix ge-, shortened to g. This prefix is rare in Scand., but occurs in O. Icel. glíkr, like, now líkr, where the use of g- for ge- is obvious. -Icel. leikr, a game, play, sport. -Icel. leika, strong verb, to play, sport, delude, put a trick upon, bewitch. +Swed. leka, to sport, play. +Dan. lege, to play. +A. S. gelæcan, pt. t. gelæc, to put a trick upon, delude, whence gelæc, sb. play. The pt. t. gelæc, deluded, occurs in Ælfred, tr. of Orosius, b. iii. ch. 7. § 4.

GLEEK (2), a game at cards. (F., -G.) So in Ben Jonson, Alchem. v. 2 (Subtle); it is said that Catharine of Arragon 'played at gleeche'; Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, sect. liv; vol. iii. p. 258, note c, ed. 1840. See Nares. It should rather have been spelt glík, but was confused with the word above; see the pun in Greene's Tu Quoque (Nares). -O. F. glie, an old F. game at cards (mentioned in Rabelais, bk. i. c. 22); Roquefort; 'selon Villon et Coquillard, il signifie bonheur, hazard'; Nares. -G. glück, luck; see Luck.

GLINT. Cf. 'an aungyl that glenti,' i. e. shone; Cov. Myst. ed. Halliwell, p. 389.

GLITTER. Cf. A. S. glitian. 'Rutilare, glitian;' Mone, Quellen, p. 355.

GLÖW. Though the A. S. glōwan is rare, we find examples of it. The pres. part. glōwende occurs in Ælfric's Homilies, i. 424, last line, and in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 216, l. 1. It is not a weak verb, as is supposed; for I have found the pt. t. glēow in Ælfric's Lives of Saints, vii. 240. See my edition, p. 184.

GLOZE. Not (F., -L.), but (F., -L., -Gk.).

GNARL. The A. S. verb is rather gnyrran than gnyrran; the pres. part. gnyrende occurs, to translate Lat. stridentes; A. S. Leechdoms, iii. 210, l. 12. But the note is not quite certain; Mr. Cockayne adds the note, 'I read grinende.'

GOAL, l. 10. It may be better to leave out the reference to prov. E. wallop, which appears to be, etymologically, much the same as gallop; see Gallop.

GOOSEBERRY. 'Vua crispia is also called Grossularia, in english a Grosier bushe, a Goosebery bush;' W. Turner, Names of Herbes, 1548, p. 88 (E. D. S.). Cf. 'Ramni, grosiler,' in Wright's Voc. i. 141; where grosiler is an O. F. form. 'Goseberry, groseille; Goseberry-busshe, groseillier;' Palsgrave.

GOSPEL. There is an earlier instance of the alteration of godspell into gōdspell than the one given from the Ormulum. In a Vocabulary of the 11th century, we find: 'Euvangelium (sic), id est, bonum nuntium, god-spel,' the accent being unmarked; Wright's Voc. i. 75. Doubtless, this reasonable alteration is very old, but Grein's argument remains sound, viz. that we must account for the Icel. and O. H. G. forms.

GRAIL (3). Another view is that Spenser meant grail to represent F. grêle, O. F. gresle, hail. This would appear more clearly if we could find an example of O. F. gresle used to mean 'pebble,' which appears to be the lit. signification. For F. grêle, sb., O. F. gresle, is supposed to be a dimin. of F. grès, sand-stone (cf. F. grésil, sleet). -G. gries, cognate with E. Grit, q. v. This makes Spenser's grail to have the lit. sense of 'fine grit,' which is precisely the sense required. Der. engrailed, which see above.

GRAMARYE, magic. (F., -L., -Gk.) Used by Scott, Lay of the Last Minstrel, iii. 11, vi. 17; who took it from 'King Estmere' in Percy's Reliques, where it occurs in a passage the genuineness of which is very doubtful; see Percy Folio MS., ii. 604, l. 144, ii. 606, l. 274. The same word as M. E. gramery, gramory, skill in grammar, or (jestingly) skill in magic. 'Cowthe ye by youre gramery reche us a drynk, I should be more mery;' Towneley Myst. p. 90. 'I se thou can of gramory and som what of arte;' id. p. 311. -O. F. gramaire, grammar; see Grammar.

I desire here to record my opinion, that the word glamour, magic, also used by Scott in the same poem (iii. 9), and taken by him from the expression 'They coost the glamer o'er her' in Johnny Faa (printed in Ritson's Sc. Poems, ii. 176), is nothing but another form of gramery, i. e. grammar. The note in Vigfusson's Dict. asserting the identity of glamour with Icel. glámr, the moon, I believe to be a mere delusion, due to a clutching at an 'etymology.' The Icel. glámr = A. S. glēm = E. gleam; just as Icel. sáð = A. S. sæd = E. seed. The -r in glám-r is no true syllable, but merely a case-ending. I see that Littré (s. v. grimoire) agrees with me as to glamour.

GRAPPLE. Not (F.), but (F., -M. H. G.).

GRAZE (1). I strongly suspect that the use of graze, in the sense 'to touch slightly in passing,' actually arose from graze, the verb formed from the sb. grass. I think that graze may have taken the sense 'to touch the grass slightly' from the rebounding of shot when touching the surface of grassy ground, and slightly tearing it up. In Hen. V. iv. 3. 105, the 'bullet's grazing' seems to mean the bullet's rebound from the earth. Confusion with grate and raze may have dimmed its true origin.

GREENGAGE, a kind of plum. This stands for green Gage, where Gage is a personal name. It is the French plum called la grosse Reine Claude, and is written as Green Gage in P. Miller, Gardener's Dictionary, 7th ed. 1759, s. v. Prunus. There is also a blue Gage and a purple Gage. 'Plum; of the many sorts, the following are good: Green and blue gage, Fotheringham, &c.; C. Marshall, Introd. to Gardening, 1796, p. 350. In R. Hogg's Fruit Manual, 4th ed. 1875, it is said to have been introduced 'at the beginning of the last century, by Sir T. Gage, of Hengrave Hall, near Bury, who procured it from his brother, the Rev. John Gage, a Roman Catholic priest then resident in Paris.' The following account is more explicit, and gives the name as Sir William Gage. In Hortus Collinsonianus, p. 60, are some Memoranda by Mr. Collinson, written 1759-1765, where is the following entry. 'On Plums. Mem. I was on a visit to Sir William Gage, at Hengrave, near Bury: he was then near 70. He told me that he first brought over, from France, the Grosse Reine Claude, and introduced it into England; and in compliment to him the Plum was called the Green Gage; this was about the year 1725.' (J. A. H. Murray.)

β. It must be added, that Mr. Hogg shews that there is reason for supposing that this plum was known in England at least a century earlier than the above date, but was then called the Verdock, from the Ital. verdochia, obviously derived from verde (L. uiridis), green. But this does not affect the etymology of the present name.

GRIDDLE. The spelling gredyron, for gridiron, occurs in Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 153 (A. D. 1559). Palsgrave has gyrdiron.

GRIG. The etymology is very doubtful. If it be derived from a Scand. strong verb, signifying 'to creep,' as I suppose, it must be distinguished from cricket, and the reference to Cricket (1) must be omitted, as will appear by reference to that article. The weakening of k to g occurs in some instances, as in grant, a derivative of credere; gräpnel, due to M. H. G. krapfe, grate (1) from Lat. crata, for crates, golf from kolf, gondola from kónvō, goblin from kóβαλος, gall (2) from callus, gabion from cauus.

GRIMALKIN. Malkin is certainly a dimin. of Maud, as explained in my note to Piers Plowman, C. ii. 181. 'Malkyne, or Mawt, propyr name, Molt, Mawde, Matildis, Matilda;' Prompt. Parv. Thus the word is of O. H. G. origin; from O. H. G. mahl-hilt, used as a proper name. Here makt means 'might,' cognate with E. might; and hill means 'battle,' cognate with A. S. hild, battle.

GRISLY. There is a difficulty about the A. S. forms; there are forms which point to a base GRUS, viz. begrorene, gryre, gryrelle, whilst others point to a base GRIS, viz. ágrisan. My supposition that ágrisan is put for ágrýsan, is hardly tenable; for we find the pt. t. agros in Rob. of Glouc. p. 549, l. 13, and agras in Layamon, l. 11976; see Strattmann, s. v. agrisen. Other languages support the theory that there must have been two forms of the base. 1. From the base GRUS we have G. graus, horror, grausen, to cause to shudder, M. H. G. grús, horror, &c.; also, from a shorter base GRU, we have G. grauen, M. H. G. grüen, impers. verb. to shudder, graulich, gräulich, hideous, Dan. gru, horror, terror; see GRUESOME. 2. Again, from the base GRIS we may deduce O. Du. grijselich, horrible (Hexham), O. H. G. grisenlich (Graff, iv. 301); and cf. Swed. gräslig, Dan. græsselig, hideous, horrible. Richthofen gives O. Fries. grislik in his Dictionary, but gryslik in his text. There has evidently been considerable confusion of the forms.

GROCE. Spelt grosser, Stat. of the Realm, i. 379, an. 1363; grossour, Lib. Custumarium, p. 304.

GROMWELL, a plant. (F., -L.) The letter w is a modern insertion; Cotgrave, s. v. gremil, gives gromill, grummell; Palsgrave has gromell; the Prompt. Parv. has gromaly or gromely sede; grumel occurs in the 14th century, in Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 52, l. 1; and the Cath. Angl. has both grumelle and gromelle. The gromwell or Lithospermum is remarkable for its hard, stony seeds; I therefore propose to derive M. E. gromel or grumel from O. F. grumel, mod. F. grumeau, a clot. Roquefort gives O. F. grumel, 'pelote, peloton'; dimin. of grume, used to mean all kinds of grain. Cotgrave also gives grum as a Languedoc word synonymous with F. grain, grain. -Lat. grumulus, a little hillock; dimin. of grumus, a hillock. It would seem that the Lat. grumus came to mean a mere clot of earth. Cf. Span. grumillo, a small clot, a curd; from grumo, a clot. ¶ It is usual to derive gromwell from F. grémil (also grenil in Cotgrave), which is the F. name for the plant. But such a vowel-change is quite inexplicable, and it is supposed that grenil is an older form than grémil, being perhaps a derivative from Lat. granum, a grain. The derivation of the E. word from grume, often used as synonymous with grain, seems to satisfy the conditions. We may note that gromwell is also called in E. gray millet or (in Cotgrave) graymill, which is merely the F. grémil ingeniously made partly significant, and was clearly suggested by the fact that gromwell was sometimes called milium solis as well as granum solis; see Cath. Anglicum.

GROWL. 'I wolde . . . that ther sholde thenne suche wrake [vengeance] be taken therof, that hym myght growle that euer he sawe hym;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 30, ed. Arber, p. 78, l. 37.

GRUNT. The A. S. verb is, rather, grunian. We find 'sus grunniit, swin grunab'; Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 129, l. 3.

GUARANTEE. Spelt garauntye, Langtoft's Chron. i. 218; garantie, Stat. of the Realm, i. 37, an. 1275; warrantie, Year-books of Edw. I. ii. 331.

GUAVA. Spelt guayva in 1593; Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 532; in an account of Drake's expedition to Panama, &c. It is also mentioned in 1689; id. vii. 367. Minshew's Span. Dict. (1623) has 'Guaiabos, a kinde of fruit in the Indies.'

GUILDER, a Dutch coin. (Du., -G.) In Shak. Com. Errors, i. 1. 8; iv. 1. 4. A corrupt form of Du. guldén, a guilder, 'a piece of 20 stivers' (Sewel). Hexham has Carolus guilder, 'a Charles gilder'; Philippus guilder, 'a Philip's gilder'; the former evidently refers to Charles V., and the name of the coin is borrowed from German. -G. gulden, gülden, a florin; as the name implies, the coin was at first of gold, though afterwards made of silver. The M. H. G. name was guldin, or guldin pfennig, the golden penny (Lat. aureus denarius). Formed, with vowel-change of o to u, and adj. suffix -in, from G. gold, gold, cognate with E. GOLD. See Weigand. Cf. Goth. gultheins, golden, from gult, gold.

GULES. Spelt goules in Anglo-F., in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 430. Cf. gule, throat, mouth, in Philip de Thauin, Bestiary, l. 875.

GULF. Rather (F., -Ital., -Gk.) 'This word, as Niebuhr teaches, passed into the Italian from the Greek towns in the South of Italy, where the Hellenic language was not extinguished till the third or even the eighth century after Christ;' Cockayne, Spoon and Sparrow, p. 65. Niebuhr says, 'Traces of Greek words still exist in the Neapolitan dialect. The Italian word golf (sic) is evidently formed from κόπος: the bay of Naples is specially called the gulf; but the ancients also called it παράγος;' Lectures on Ethnography, tr. by L. Schmitz, ii. 140.

GUM (2). The word is of Egyptian origin; the Coptic form of the word is komē (whence Gk. κόμμη); see Peyron, Coptic Dict. p. 67.

GURNARD. Cf. crooner, a gurnard, so called because it croons or murmurs (Jamieson). See Palmer's Folk-Etymology.

GUT. The M. E. gut or gutte, gut, is not quite the same word as M. E. gote, a water-channel, which latter is cognate with G. gosse, a kennel, sewer. But they are closely related; we may derive the former from the base of gut-on, pt. pl. of geotan, to pour, and the latter from the base of got-en, pp. of the same.

GYPSY. The Gk. Αἴγυπτος is not der. from the old Egyptian language, but is prob. of Semitic origin. The native name of Egypt was Chemí (the Ham of the Bible). Αἴγυπτος is probably a Gk. form of the Phœnician name I-KAFT, 'the isle or coast of Kaft.' Kaft is the native name of Phœnicia, and means 'a palm-tree'; cf. Phœnicia and φœνιξ, a palm. -A. L. M. 'A company of lowde personnes within this realme, calling themselves Gipeyans;' Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 101 (1537). 'Wandering vagabonds calling and naming themselves Egiptians;' Harman's Caveat, p. 23 (1567).

GYRFALCON. Spelt gerfacoun in Mandeville's Trav. p. 238.

HABERDASHER. The word occurs early in the 14th century. Some ill-made caps were found 'super diversos haberdasshers et capellarios;' Liber Memorandum, temp. Edw. II., pr. in Liber Albus, ed. Riley, iii. 433.

HACK (1). The pt. t. tô-haccode, from an infin. tô-haccian, occurs in S. Veronica, ed. Goodwin (Cambridge, 1851), p. 36, l. 22. (T. N. Toller.)

HAGGIS, a dish commonly made in a sheep's maw, of the minced lungs, heart, and liver of the same animal. (E.; with F. suffix.) M. E. hagas, hageys, hakkys, Prompt. Parv. Also spelt haggas, hagges, hakeys; see notes to Prompt. Parv., and to the Catholicon Anglicum, p. 169; also the account in Jamieson. It answers to the F. hachis, 'a hachee, a sliced gallimaufry, or minced meat;' Cot. And it appears to have been formed, in imitation of this F. sb., directly from the E. hack, to cut small, of which a common Lowland Sc. form is hag, appearing also in the E. frequentative haggle; see HAGGLE (1). And see HASH. Cf. also Du. haksel, minced meat, and Low G. haks un plüks, a kind of hash or mince. ¶ The Gael. taigies, a haggis, is merely borrowed from English; see note on HOGSHEAD, p. 811.

HALE (2), HAUL. Not (E.), but (F., -Scand.). The vowel shews that it must have been borrowed from F. haler, to hale or haul. This F. word was borrowed, in its turn, from Scandinavian; cf. Swed. hala, Dan. hale, also O. H. G. halôn, as already given. It makes no difference in the ultimate result, or in the root, the A. S. holian being cognate with the Scand. and G. words. The F. haler occurs in the 12th cent. as a nautical word (Littré).

HALIBUT. It is suggested that the M. E. butte is rather 'flounder' than 'plaice'; cf. G. butte, a flounder. The Tauchnitz Du. Dict. gives Du. bot, 'a flounder, plaice.' The fact is simply that fish-names, like plant-names, are in a state of great confusion.

HALT (2), as sb., a sudden stop; as a verb, to stop quickly at the word of command. (Ital., -G.) 'And in their march soon made a halt;' Sir W. Davenant, The Dream, st. 19. A military term. Dr. Murray says it first came in as an Ital. term, without initial h; and Richardson quotes the form alt from Milton, P. L. vi. 532, where mod. editions have halt. -Ital. alto; as in fare alto, to make a halt, to stop. -G. halt, halt! lit. hold! from halten, to hold, check, cognate with E. HOLD (1), q.v. The word has passed, from G., into several languages.

HAM. Add: Icel. hóm, the ham or haunch of a horse. + Swed. dial. ham, hind part of the knee. + Du. ham, the ham.

HAMLET. Anglo-F. hamelet, Year-books of Edw. I. i. 25, 185; also hamel, Stat. of the Realm, i. 327, an. 1352.

HAMMER-CLOTH. Orig. spelt with only one m. 'Hamer-clothes, with our armes and badges of our colours and all other things apperteynyng unto the said wagon;' Archæologia, xvi. 91 (Document of the time of Q. Mary). See N. and Q. 2 S. xi. 66. Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, corrects 'coach' to 'couch' in my quotation from Sewel. But in the copy used by me (ed. 1754, p. 138) the word is 'coach'; and so it is in Hexham. Sewel explains koets both by 'coach' and by 'couch'; Hexham explains koetse both by 'coach' and by 'bed'; and gives the verb koetsen, 'to ride in a coach or wagon,' where the sense cannot be doubted. Sewel may be wrong, but my quotation is accurate, as may be verified by any who may please to look. I may note that hammer cannot possibly be from Icel. ham-r, where the -r is merely a case-sign, and nothing more.

HANG. There is a slight mistake here. It is a remarkable fact that, contrary to the usual rule, the A. S. hangian, though a weak verb, is intransitive; whilst hón, the strong form, is transitive. It is due to some confusion; for such is not the case in the cognate tongues. The Icel. hengja, G. hängen, are weak, but transitive; whilst Icel. hanga, G. hanger, are strong, but intransitive. I have given the general Teutonic use correctly; the A. S. use is exceptional.

HANKER. In the Glossary to Hazlitt's O. Plays, we actually find 'hanker, to hang, ix. 379'; but the reference is wrong.

HAREBELL. Spelt hare-belle in the fifteenth century; Wright's Voc. i. 226, col. 2.

HARICOT. Wedgwood explains 'haricot beans' from their being 'sliced up in pieces when served at table, and [they] are therefore called in Du. snijboonen, from snijden, to cut.' He also cites O.F. harigoter, to cut to pieces; Génin, Récréations, i. 46. See Scheler.

HARRIDAN. Wedgwood objects to my definition, but it is fully borne out by the use of it in the passage in Pope to which I refer; and see Grose, as quoted by Halliwell. We actually find, in Neuman's Span.-Eng. Dict., harridan explained as (1) caballo viejo, (2) ramera vieja. Some imagine haridelle, harridan to be from Lat. forms *aridellus, *aridanus (from aridus, dry); but such forms are not to be found.

HATCH. The dat. hæcce occurs in Thorpe's Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, p. 395, l. 11. (T. N. Toller.) Also in a Charter of Eadred, A.D. 955. Cf. Prompt. Parv. p. 231, note 2.

HAUGHTY. The M.E. hauhtein became hawtyn (Book of St. Albans, fol. a. 5) and then hawty (Palsgrave).

* HAWSE, HAWSE-HOLE (Scand.) 'Hawses, two large round holes in a ship, under the head or beak, through which the cables pass, when the ship lies at anchor;' Phillips, ed. 1706. Cf. 'I was forced to cut cable in the hawse;' Eng. Garner, vii. 83 (ab. 1606). So called because made in the 'neck' or bow of the ship. — Icel. háls, hals, the neck; also (as a sea-term) part of the bow of a ship or boat. Cf. Du. hals, neck; halsklamp, a hawse-hole; Dan. and Swed. hals, neck, also a tack (as a sea-term). Also A.S. heals, G. hals, neck; cf. Lat. collum, neck. ¶ Distinct from hawser; see below.

HAWSER, HALSER, a small cable (F., — L.) [Under this heading, Wedgwood notes (I believe rightly) that I have mixed up two different things. Hawser, properly a 'tow-rope,' is of F. origin, whilst hause is 'a round hole through which the anchor-cable runs,' and is of Scand. origin. The words have, accordingly, a purely accidental resemblance, which certainly caused me to fall into a trap. The right etymology of hause is given just above. As for that of hawser, it follows here.] 'Hawser, a three-stroud [three-strand?] rope, or small cable, which serves for many uses at sea, to draw a ship over a bar, or to fasten the main and fore-shrouds;' Phillips, ed. 1706. Kersey, ed. 1715, merely gives 'Hawser, a three-stroud (sic) rope, or small cable.' In Sherwood, Index to Cotgrave, halser means a tow-rope. In Grafton's Chron., Rich. III., an. 3, we read: 'He wayed up his ancors and halsed [hoisted] up his sayles.' In Blount's Glossographia, 1674, we find: 'Halsier (halsarius) he that hales or draws a Ship or Barge along the River by a Rope or halser.' Formed, with suffix -er, from the F. verb hauis-er, hauis-er, 'to hoise, raise, elevate;' Cot. This verb also had once the sense 'to tow a boat,' as appears from the derivative haulserée, 'the drawing or haling of barges up a river by the force of men ashore;' Cot. It also meant to hoist, which explains the word halsed in the extract from Grafton above. Hausser is the same word as Ital. alzare, to raise, lift up, elevate, whence were formed O. Ital. alzana, 'a halse to draw a bote withall,' and alzaniere, 'a halsier or he that haleth a ship, a halse or halsier [hawser] in a ship;' Florio. — Low Lat. altiare, to elevate (Ducange). — Lat. altus, high; see Altitude, Altar.

HEBREW. Heb. ivri is a gentile name, and could not have been applied to Abraham simply as a 'crosser over.' The best explanation is that the word means 'one of a people dwelling in éver (in the Bible, Heber), i. e. the land 'beyond' the Euphrates; from the root ávar, to cross over. 'Hebrew' was the name by which the Israelites were called by Semitic non-Israelites; because they had come originally from the East of the Euphrates. — A. L. M.

HEDGE. The M.E. hegge properly answers to A.S. hecg, like edge = A.S. ecg; I find the gen. hegge (for hegge) in a Charter of Offa, A.D. 785. The closely allied A.S. hege does not account for the form hedge, but only for the M.E. hei or hai, spelt hay in the Rom. of the Rose, l. 54; see hay in Halliwell. Cf. F. haie, of Teut. origin.

HEIFER. I should have been more exact here. The A.S. heahfore (sometimes heafere, and even heahfru, as in Wright's Voc. i. 287, col. 2) is feminine, like heifer in mod.E. It can only be connected with A.S. feor (better fearr) by referring each to the same root. In this view, the fem. for-e corresponds to Gk. νόπις, a heifer, in being formed directly from ✓ PAR, to produce; and heahfore would mean 'fully-grown heifer' or 'cow.' β. But A.S. fearr, an ox, cognate with Icel. farri, and allied to G. farre (and the fem. farse), certainly answers to an Aryan form PAR-SI (Fick, i. 664), from the same root. ¶ To imagine any connection between heahfore and A.S. hefer, a goat (as in Palmer's Folk-Etymology), is due to ignorance; for heah (= Goth. hauhs) represents a Teut. base HAUHA (Fick, iii. 76), whilst hefer represents a Teut. base HAFRA (id. iii. 64). Anything may be made out of anything by neglecting all phonetic laws. Whatever be the etymology of heifer, the first syllable, in A.S., is heah, high. Cf. 'fearr oððe heafre,' Levit. iii. 1, where fearr and heahfore represent the male and female of the same animal. The M.E. hekfere is an altered form, made as though from hek, a heck, enclosure (unless k represents the aspirate), and feor, put for fore.

HEIRLOOM. M.E. heyr-lome, A.D. 1424; in Early E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 56, l. 32.

HEMLOCK. The A.S. forms are hemlic, hymlice; also hymblice, with excrement b; see A. S. Leechdoms, iii. 331. The M.E. forms are hemlok, and humlok, humloke, homelock, as cited. The form homelock seems to point to the omission of a second syllable; it seems to me probable that hymlice is for hynlice = *hunelice or *hünelice, that is, 'stinking leek' or plant. Hüne occurs as another name for hár-hüne, hoar-hound; A.S. Leechdoms, ii. 42. We might then compare hüne with Gk. κύνιον (Lat. conium), hemlock, κύν-λην, an origanum (strong-scented plant), Lat. ci-cu-ta, hemlock, cun-ire, 'stercus facere,' in-quin-are, to pollute, Skt. kun-apa, carrion; all from ✓ KUN or KWAN, to stink, Skt. knúy, to stink. See Fick, i. 51; Vaniček, 163. See Hoarhound.

HENBANE. Spelt hennebone (i. e. hen-bane) in the 13th cent.; Wright's Voc. i. 141, col. 2; hennebane in the 15th cent., id. 265, col. 2.

HENCHMAN. M.E. henchman; see Prompt. Parv. p. 233, note 1; where are numerous examples. The pl. henzemen occurs as early as 1415; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 220.

HERIOT. Anglo-F. heriet, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 213. Corrupted from the A.S. by Norman scribes.

HERRING. If herring is so called with reference to the fish appearing in large shoals, cf. W. ysgadan, herrings, from cad, a host or army. (D. Silvan Evans.)

HEYDAY (2). Smollett actually writes: 'in the high-day of youth and exultation;' Humphrey Clinker, 1771, ii. 50 (Davies).

HIERARCHY. Spelt yerarchy, Skelton, Dethe of the Erle of Northumberlande, 211.

HIGGLE. Perhaps (O. Low G.) rather than (E.). Wedgwood suggests that the likeness to haggle is deceptive, and that the verb to higgle is merely made out of the sb. higgler. This is very probable; and we may then look upon higgler (as he suggests) as being a form of one of the numerous words noted under HUCKSTER. In particular, the Du. heukelaar, a huckster, retailer (Sewel) comes sufficiently near, and we may easily have borrowed the word (not in early use) from the Low Countries. Wedgwood also cites Bavarian hugler, a petty dealer, der. from hugke, a pack on the back; cf. Bavar. huckeln, to put on the back, hocken, hucken, to be hunched up; Schmeller, 1050, 1072. This is to the point, as being an allied form.

HINT. Perhaps (Scand.), not (E.). Wedgwood's suggestion, of a connection with Icel. ymta, to mutter, ymtr, a muttering (from ymr, a humming sound), Dan. ymte, to whisper about a thing, is well worthy of consideration. He cites the Dan. sentence: 'og intet ord, som ymtede hans Forset,' i. e. and not a word, that gave a hint of his purpose. My own impression (at present) is that hint really represents these Scand. words, the h being added by confusion with M.E. hinten, to catch, already cited. The change of mt to nt was, of course, inevitable, as in ant, ant, Hants. And I remain of opinion that these Scand. words are likewise of use in explaining the difficult word inkling, in spite of some derivative remarks that have been made upon my account of the word at p. 294. I see no difficulty in regarding inkle as being put for *int-le, the regular frequentative form of the verb to *int, here supposed to be the original form of hint. As to sense, the connection is of the closest. As to form, Cotgrave, s. v. andoilliers, writes ankler for antler; and the h is unoriginal in haughty, haunch, hautboy, hauiser, hermit, howl, and yellow-hammer. Cf. M. Müller, Lect. ii. 184 (8th ed.).

HIP (2). A.S. heope is the full form; Wright's Voc. i. 30, col. 2.

HIPPISH, HIP (1). The following curious quotation shows that the verb to hip was really formed from the sb. hypochondria, and arose at Cambridge as a piece of University slang. 'It is observable that among the University Men [at Cambridge], that almost half of them are Hypt, as they call it, that is, disordered in their brains, sometimes mopish, sometimes wild, the two different effects of their laziness and debauchery;' note by Dr. J. Edwards (died 1716), in a fragment printed in Report of Camb. Antiquarian Soc., 1878, p. 130.

HISTORY. We even find A.S. istoria (Grein).

HIVE. The A.S. was prob. hyfe (with long y); we find also 'Alvearia, hyfa; alvearii, hyfe;' Mone, Quellen, pp. 333, 334. It is, moreover, a very old word, occurring as hyfi (= hyff) in the Corpus glossary of the 8th century. Sweet gives kūpiō* as the presumable prehistoric Aryan form whence it would regularly be descended. This makes it co-radicate with Cup and Coif; and the orig. sense would be 'vessel' or 'cup.' In any case, it is to be noted that the A. S. vowel was y, from Aryan ū, the base being KUP-; see root no. 78, p. 732. The suggestion at p. 267 as to a connection with ✓KI and A. S. hwisc is entirely wrong. Delete all the article except the references.

HOARDING. Not (Du.), but (F., = Du.). The Anglo-F. pl. hurdys, hoardings, occurs in the Lib. Albus, p. 477.

HOBBY (1). Cf. hoby, a small horse, occurring A.D. 1420; Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 53; hoby, ab. 1400, Reliq. Antiq. ii. 23.

HOD. Not (F., = G.), but (E.). I at once accept Wedgwood's correction. Hod is no corruption of F. hôte (as said in Webster and Worcester), which describes a different kind of receptacle, but is simply the prov. E. hod, a receptacle or 'hold,' borrowed from Northern and E. Anglian dialects. Hod, as used by Tusser, is E. Anglian, and is given by Forby and Moor. Miss Baker mentions coal-hod and cinder-hod, as known in Northamptonshire. Nall notes E. Angl. hoddng-spade as a spade used in the fens, shaped to take up large portions of the earth entire, i.e. a 'holding-spade.' Hod for hold is very widely spread, occurring in Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, while Shropshire has houd or hout. Ray, in 1691, already notes hod, to hold, as occurring in 'various dialects' in the North. The clearest examples are in the Whitby Glossary; a powder-hod, a flask for powder; 'has he a good hod,' i.e. holding-power, capacity, ability; a candle-hod, a candle-stick, &c. See also the Holderness Glossary. Thus hod is simply hold or 'receptacle,' a pure E. word. See Hold. ¶ There is no example of hot, a basket, in English, as far as I know.

HOG. The Celtic origin of this word is, after all, very doubtful, though it is the one most usually given. I think it is better to adopt the suggestion of E. Müller, who connects it with the verb to hack. It seems to me to be derived from the Lowland Scotch hag, to cut (a weakened form of hack), whence also haggle and haggis. This is well borne out by M. E. hogge, 'maialis, est enim porcus carens testiculis,' Catholicon Anglicum, p. 187. Mr. Herrtage cites from Baret: 'a barrowe hog, a gilt or gelded hog, maialis;' also hog-pigs, barrow-pigs, Whitby Glossary. Hence we may explain hog, a young sheep, hog-colt, a yearling colt, and the other similar prov. E. forms in Halliwell, such as hogat, a two-year old sheep, hoggaster, a boar in its third year, hogget, a sheep or colt after it has passed its first year, hoggerel, which Palsgrave explains by 'a yong shepe,' hoglin, a boar. So also prov. G. hacksh, a boar (Flügel); from hacken, to cut. The suggested W. origin is plainly inadequate. It is remarkable that we find prov. E. hog, verb, to cut the hair short; see Miss Baker's Northants. Gloss., Halliwell, and Holloway's Dict. of Provincialisms. This verb is by Holloway derived from the sb. hog, but it may well be that the etymology runs the other way. Indeed, Mr. Cockayne explains hog as a cut boar, a hog-sheep as one whose wool is clipped the first year, and a hog-mane as one cut near the neck; Spoon and Sparrow, p. 79.

HOGSHEAD. 'The hoggis hed [has] lxij. galons;' Arnold's Chron., ed. 1811, p. 190. Hexham's Du. Dict. (1658) has 'oxhoof, a hog's-head.' Spelt hoggeshead in Palsgrave (1530). The earliest quotation I have yet met with is: 'pyppas and hoggys hedys of wyne;' Gregory's Chron. of London, 1460, p. 207 (Camden Soc.). In the Chron. of Calais (Camd. Soc.), p. 50 (A.D. 1500) we find: 'ii. hos-hedys of yprocas.' Here hos (says Mr. F. Hall) appears to be simply the Du. os, an ox, with the h gratuitously prefixed. The Gael. toesaid is merely borrowed from E. hogshead; cf. Gael. taigeis = E. haggis. See C. H. H. Wright, Irish Gram., 1855, p. 6, rule 1.

HOIST. Palsgrave has the forms hyce and hyse, which completely settle the etymology.

HOLE. I think section γ may be omitted; and I doubt whether Curtius can be right. The A. S. hol follows so easily from A. S. hol-en, pp. of helan, to hide, that it seems best to keep to the solution in section β.

HOLLAND. I am told that Dutch etymologists explain the word as holt-land, i.e. woodland; see Holt. The word occurs in 1502. 'A pece [of] holland or any other lynnyn cloth conteyneth lx ellis;' Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 206. Still earlier we find: 'A shert of feyn Holand;' Cov. Myst. p. 241.

HOLLYHOCKS. Spelt holyhocks, Ben Jonson, Pan's Anniversary, l. 29.

HONEYSUCKLE. Cf. 'Ligustrum, humisuccus;' Wright's Voc. i. 68, col. 1, l. 3; 'Ligustrum, humisuccles, ed. 140, col. 2. Spelt honi-soukil, Wyclif, Works, ed. Arnold, ii. 5, l. 6.

HOOP (1). The A. S. hōp-pāda, a kind of cope, in Wright's Voc. i. 59, possibly contains an example of hōp=hoop.

HOP (2). We find: 'volubilis major, hoppe;' where hoppe is an Old Westphalian (Old Saxon) form; Mone, Quellen, p. 292. The word appears as early as in Arnold's Chronicle (ab. 1502), in the pl. form hoppis or hoppys, ed. 1811, pp. 236, 246; and hops are frequently mentioned in the Northumberland Household Book, 1512. See Catholicon Anglicum, p. 28, note 8. The exx. in Arnold occur in what seems to be a list of imports, doubtless from Holland. Palsgrave has: 'hoppes for beer, houblon.' Perhaps the A. S. gloss 'hopu, lygustra' refers to hops; A. S. Leechdoms, iii. 332.

HOPE (1). A. S. hōpa, hope, occurs in the simple form in Ælfric's Hom. i. 350, l. 24; i. 568, l. 8.

HOPE (2). An earlier example of forlorn hope occurs in An Eng. Garner, vii. 128, where Sir F. Vere is describing the battle of Newpourt (S. W. of Ostend) in the year 1600. This directly connects the phrase with the Dutch language.

HORDE. Zenker, in his Turk. Dict., gives urdu, ord, ordá, urdu, a camp, p. 117. The word is of Tatar origin; M. Pavet de Courteille, in his Dict. Turk-Oriental, gives urdu, 'campement royal, camp;' p. 84. Thence it found its way into Turkish and Persian.

HORNET. As to the derivation of A. S. hyrnet from horn, there can be no question, y being the vowel regularly substituted for o in such derivatives. But the reason assigned (as suggested by Skinner and others) that it is so named from its antennæ, is not the right one. It is so named from the loud sound which it makes, as if blowing a horn. (Cf. 'the beetle winds His small but sullen horn;' Collins, Ode to Evening, st. 3.) This is shewn by Weigand, in discussing the cognate G. horniss, a hornet; and he points out that the Low G. name for hornet was 'horn-bearer.' See Kleinere altniederdeutsche Denkmäler, ed. Heyne, p. 89, l. 13, where we find the Low-G. gloss: 'crabrones, horno-beron.'

HOUSEL. Fick connects Goth. *huns*l with Lith. szwentas, Ch. Slav. svęti, holy (cf. Russ. sviatoi, holy), and Zend speñta, holy. For the correspondence of the initial letters, cf. A. S. hwit with Russ. svietite, to shine; see White. If this be right, the orig. sense of Goth. *huns*l was 'a holy rite.'

HOUSINGS. The term houss, is of rather early occurrence. It occurs in the Catholicon Anglicum, spelt houss (A.D. 1483). Mr. Herrtage refers to the Household and Wardrobe Expenses of Edw. II., ed. Furnivall, p. 43; but the MS. referred to is only a very late translation from the French, made in 1601.

HOVER. I understand that Prof. Rhys takes the W. hofs to be borrowed from E. Thus the derivation given is quite correct.

HOW (1). March makes A. S. hū and A. S. hwy precisely the same word. See Why.

HOWITZER. Jungmann's Bohemian Dict. (1835), vol. i. p. 662, has—'haufnice, haufnice, lithobolus, ballista minor, quæ saxa seu lapides torquebat . . . eine Haubitze, ein Granatengeschütz.' The M. H. G. form (15th cent.) was hawffnitiz (Weigand).

HOWL. Add: Du. huilen. + Icel. ýla. + Dan. hyle. + Swed. yla, to howl.

HUDDLE. It may be as well to point out that there is no contradiction in the passage from Rob. Manning, in l. 8. It means that the Scots, as an army, were scattered or dispersed, and thus broken up into small knots of men who were huddled together in huts for refuge. Cf. Shroph. hod, to cover potatoes with straw and soil, to protect them from frost; hod, a store-heap of such potatoes; hud, to collect, gather together. The ideas of hiding, covering, and heaping together seem to me to be all connected with hudd-le.

HUGE. Cf. Anglo-F. ahogement, hugely, Gaimar's Chron. 5669.

HUGENOT. There is an earlier use of the name than that cited by Littré. In Will. of Palerne, l. 362, occurs the name Hugonet, where the F. original (earlier than A.D. 1350) has Hugenet. The variation in the suffix is unimportant; all the forms (Huguenot, Hugonet, Hugenet) being diminutives of F. Hugues.

HULK. We find A. S. hulc as a gloss to liburna, Wright's Voc. i. 56; and Low Lat. hulcus in Ancient Laws, ed. Thorpe, i. 300, l. 5.

HULL (2), the body of a ship. Not (E.), but (Du.). It occurs also in Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 60. But there is an example in M. E., where it is spelt holl. 'The gudes that thai robbed In holl gan thai it hide,' L. Minot, in Polit. Poems, ed. Wright, p. 88. This renders it almost certain that the word is not E. at all, but borrowed from Du. hol; Sewel has: 'het hol van een schip, the ships hold or hull.' See also Hold (2), which is the same word. It hence appears that the Du. hol, not being understood, was assimilated, sometimes to hold (as if it contained the cargo), and sometimes to hull (as if it were the shell of the ship). It is really the same word as E. hole. In the Prompt. Parv., we find both 'hoole of pesyn,' i.e. hull or shell of peas, and 'hoole, or holle of a schyppes;' but we also find 'hoole or pyt;' shewing that hull (1), hull (2), and hole were all pronounced alike in Norfolk, in 1440.

HURDYGURDY. Compare 'harryng and garryng,' i.e. snarling and growling, used by Trevisa; see Spec. of English, ed. Morris and Skeat, p. 241. The play of Midas (1764) is by O'Hara, not by Foote. The line occurs in Act 1.

HURLYBURLY. It first occurs (probably) in Bale, Kynges Johan, ed. Collier, p. 63, l. 21.

HUSSAR. The Hungarian word húsz, 'twenty', will be found in Dankovsky, Magyar Lexicon, ed. 1833; see pp. 462, 469. He also gives Hung. huszár, meaning (1) a keeper of geese, and (2) a hussar horseman. It is worth noting that these appear to be quite distinct words; huszár, a hussar, is from húsz, 'twenty', as already given; but in the sense of keeper of geese, the word is not Hungarian, but Slavonic, i.e. from Bohemian hus, a goose; cf. Russ. guse, a goose. See Jungmann's Bohemian Dict.

HUSSIF. Correctly spelt hussy in Richardson's Pamela (1741), ed. 1811, i. 162: 'I . . . dropt purposely my hussy.' (Davies.) The M. E. term was nedylle-howse, or nedyl-hows; Catholicism Anglicum, p. 250.

HYPOTENUSE. To be marked as (F., -L., -Gk.).

IBIS. The pl. ibes is in Mandeville's Travels, p. 45. The Coptic form of the word is hippen, occurring as a bird-name in Levit. xi. 17, Deut. xiv. 16, where the Vulgate has ibis, and the LXX version has ibis; see Peyron, Coptic Dict. p. 358, and Smith, Dict. Bible, s. v. Owl.

IGUANA. Called a guano in 1588; see Arber's English Garner, ii. 123, last line.

IMBROGLIO. (Ital.) Modern; in Webster. - Ital. imbroglio, perplexity, trouble, intrigue. - Ital. imbrogliare, to entangle, perplex, confuse. - Ital. im- (for in), in; broglia, a broil, confusion; see Broil (2), remarked upon at p. 788 above.

IMP. The A. S. nom. pl. impan, shoots, scions, occurs in Ælfred, tr. of Past. Care, p. 381, l. 17.

IMPARK. Anglo-F. enpark, Stat. of the Realm, i. 197; cf. enparkes, pp. pl., impounded, Year-books of Edw. I., ii. 427.

IMPLEAD. Formerly emplede; so spelt in the oath administered to Caxton upon taking up his freedom; Life of Caxton, by W. Blades, 1882, p. 146. - F. emplaidier, 'to sue, to implead'; Cot. And see Burguy, s. v. plait.

IMPOSTHUME. We also find aposteme; see Davies, Supp. Glossary. This is directly from the Lat. form.

IMPOVERISH. Perhaps not a corrupt form; cf. Anglo-F. empoverist, pt. t. sing., Langtoft's Chron. i. 286; empoverie, pp., Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 311. The E. pp. impoverychyd occurs in Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 155 (1519).

IMPRINT. M. E. emprenten, Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, ed. Morris, p. 166, last line. - O. F. empreint, pp. of empreindre, 'to print, stamp'; Cot. - Lat. imprimere, to impress; see Impress (p. 285). This throws some light upon both imprint and print; the former is emprint with change of em- to im-, to make it look more like Latin. The latter is emprint, with loss of the former syllable.

INCREASE. Found in Anglo-French; the infin. is encrestre, Stat. of the Realm, i. 284; the 2 p. pl. fut. is encresterez, Lib. Albus, p. 310.

INDENT. 'Certain indenturez trypartyte indentyd;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 57 (A.D. 1480).

INDENTURE. The Anglo-F. form is endenture, Stat. of the Realm, i. 131; an. 1299.

INFAMY. Cf. M. E. infamous, apparently in the sense of dark, non-illustrious; Wyclif, Works, i. 271, l. 16.

INFLUENZA. Foote speaks of 'the new influenza;' Lane Lover, Act i. (about 1770). It occurs also in the European Magazine, June, 1782; see N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 459.

INGLE. The Gael. aingal can hardly be a true Celtic word. It is prob. merely borrowed from Lat. igniculus, a spark, double dimin. of ignis, fire. - A. L. M.

INK. Cf. Low Lat. incaustum, glossed by E. enke; Wright's Voc. i. 116, last line.

INKLE. 'Threde [thread] and Inkyll;' Arnold's Chron. p. 237 (about 1502).

INSTEP. 'Insteppe of the fote, col du pie, le dessus du pie;' Palsgrave (1530). 'Hyghe in the instep;' A. Borde, Introd. of Knowledge, ed. Furnivall, p. 189, l. 26 (about 1542).

INTOXICATE. The root is TAKSH, extension of TAK. See Technical.

INVECKED, INVECTED, in heraldry, the reverse of engrailed, said of an edge indented with successive cusps. (L.) Formerly used with a slightly different meaning; see the diagram in the Boke of St. Albans, pt. ii. foll. d 4 (1486). Lit. 'carried in.' - Lat. invectus, borne or carried inwards, pp. of invehere. See Inveigh, p. 300, and see below.

INVEIGH. The derivation from Lat. invehere is made certain by the fact that we also find the form inveet, from the pp. inveetus. 'Fool that I am, thus to inveet against her;' Beaum. and Fletcher, Faithful Friends, iii. 3; and in the Prol. to The Hog hath Lost his Pearl, in Dodsley, Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, xi. 427, we find: 'Grunting at state-affairs, or inveeting Much at our city vices.' In the same book, viii. 75, we find the expression 'thy inveective tale,' where inveective is correctly used as an adjective. Cotgrave has invectiver, 'to inveigh.'

INVEIGLE. Puttenham, in his Arte of Poesie, lib. iii. cap. 4 (ed. Arber, p. 159), includes inveigle in his list of 'vsurped Latine and French words.' This was in 1589. In Sharington's confession, A.D. 1547, quoted in Froude's Hist. v. 132, we find 'The marquis of Dorset was . . . so seduced and aveugled by the Lord Admiral that,' &c. (Wedgwood). I find also: 'The emperor and his ambassador, whom they aveugled so with fayre words and sayings;' Calendar of State Papers, ix. 247 (1543). I incline to the derivation from F. aveugle; but more evidence is needed.

IPECACUANHA. The Brazilian name is said to be i-pe-caa-guen, or 'smaller road-side sick-making plant;' Athenæum, Jan. 18, 1879, p. 88.

IRON-MOULD; see MOULD (3), p. 818.

IRRECONCILABLE. To be marked as (F., -L.).

JACKAL. The Pers. shaghál is allied to Skt. grigála, which is prob. from an imitative root, and means 'howler;' cf. KARK, no. 59, p. 732. But the Heb. shú'al is quite a different word, being from shá'al, to dig, hollow out (Delitzsch).

JADE (1), a sorry nag, an old woman. (Scand.) In Chaucer, as cited, the MSS. have Iade. Here the I rather represents y than j, as the word is certainly the same as the Lowl. Scotch yad, yade, yaid, yaud, a jade. Jamieson gives yad as the form in Ramsay's Scot. Prov. p. 42; yaid in Dunbar's Poems, yade in Ritson's S. Songs, i. 197; and yaud as a common mod. form. Yaud seems the best form, as an l has been lost, and it stands for yald. - Icel. jalda, a mare. Cf. Prov. Swed. jäldä, a mare (Rietz). Origin obscure; perhaps related to Geld. Cf. also Icel. jálkr, a gelding, Norweg. gielk, the same; Prov. Swed. jälk, a stallion; Norweg. gielka, jalka, to geld.

JADE (2). Max Müller's letter says: 'The jade brought from America was called by the Spaniards pie-dra de yjada [or ijada], because for a long time it was believed to cure pain in the side. For similar reasons it was afterwards called lapis nephritis, nephrite, &c. This ijada became jada by loss of initial i, and lastly jade, the present Span. form.' Phillips (1706) has: 'Nephriticus lapis, a sort of green stone brought from the Indies and Spain, which is used in Nephritick Pains.' Nephritic is from Gk. νεφρίτις, disease in the kidneys; from νεφρός, kidney.

JAFE, to jest, mock, befool. (F., -Scand.) Obsolete. In Chaucer, C. T. 1731, 13623; P. Plowm. B. i. 67. Apparently confused with F. japper, to bark as a dog, but answering rather to F. gaber, 'to mock, flout, gull, cheat,' Cot.; which has just the same sense as jape. Roquefort has gab=gab, mockery. - Icel. gabb, to mock; gabb, mockery. See Gabble, Jabber; and cf. Gibe.

JAUNT. Wedgwood contests the etymology given, being unable to trace the connection between 'jolting,' which he takes to be the sense of jaunce, and 'playing tricks,' as seen in the Swed. ganta. He rightly adduces the Norfolk jounce, 'to bounce, thump, and jolt, as rough-riders are wont to do.' The fact is, that my treatment of the word is rather inadequate than wrong. There are clear traces of two parallel Teutonic bases GANT and GAMP, both with the sense of 'to act as a buffoon.' It was the business of a buffoon both to jest in words, and to use violent, ungainly motions, bobs, and jerks (which must have been tiring exercise) for the amusement of the spectators. Of these bases, GAMP (which I take to be a better form than GAMB, as in Fick) is mentioned under Jump (1); but much is omitted. Not only is it related to the words there mentioned, but it is the source of Bavar. gumpen, gumpeln, meaning not only to jump about (as already said), but, actively, to toss about, to pump water, the underlying idea being that of violent motion; Schmeller, i. 914; gumpend, gumpig, active, waggish; gumpelknecht, a fool; gumpelman, a buffoon, id. 915. But the great variety of senses is much more remarkably exemplified in Lowl. Sc. jamph, commoner as jamph, 'to make game of, sneer, mock, shuffle, jilt, trifle, spend time idly, walk slowly or idly (Banfish.); also to tire, fatigue, chafe, destroy by jogging or friction, to drive to difficulties, to travel with difficulty, as one trudging through mire;' Jamieson. Also jamphle, jamfle, 'to shuffle in walking,' id. Cf. also G. gimpel, a fool, blockhead; Swed. dial. gamp, a fool, droll (Rietz). When we remember the tricks of the old buffoons, we can understand why Swed. gump means the posteriors, whilst the Swed. dial. gimpa or gumpa, means to wriggle with the gump; cf. Dan. gumpe, to jolt, gimpe, to see-saw. Here is ample evidence as to how 'playing tricks' is consistent with violent action. β. But a parallel form GANT also appears in Swed. dial. ganta, gantas, already cited; Dan. gante, a fool; Lowl. Sc. jaunt, jaunder, already cited; and we can hardly disconnect these from the base GANK, as seen in Lowl. Sc. jink, 'to dodge, cheat, trick, to make a quick turn, move nimbly, move quickly (as a fiddle bow), to dance, spend time idly,' Jamieson; where we again remark the wide range of senses. So also Lowl. Sc. jinker, a sprightly girl, a wag, a horse that turns quickly; jank, to trifle (synonymous with jampk), jankit, fatigued, jaded; and perhaps even jouk, to shift the body aside quickly, to shift. It is clearly to the Scand. dialects that we should turn for the word, and esp. for the Scotch forms. Note that Palsgrave has the form gaunce (apparently with a hard g), in the sense to ride a horse hard. Cf. also North of E. jant, merry (Halliwell); and high-jinks, a fling, frolic.

JAUNTY. The spelling jaunty is due to the verb jaunt, with which it was easily linked, but it seems better to suppose that the true origin of jaunty was French, and it may be marked as (F., -L.). In this case, it is not really related to jaunt at all, but was merely confused with it. It was formerly spelt janty, the earliest example being that given in Todd's Johnson, which perhaps points to a supposed French origin. 'Not every one that brings from beyond seas a new gin, or janty device, is therefore a philosopher;' Hobbes Considered (1662). So also: 'A good janty way of begging;' and 'this is your janty nephew,' in The Parson's Wedding (1663), in Hazlitt's Old Plays, xiv. 401, 506. 'This jantie Sleightness to the French we owe;' T. Shadwell, Timon, p. 71 (1688). In the Spectator, no. 503, 'a janty part of the town' means 'a genteel part.' Mr. Davies notes that it is often spelt janité or janitée, as if it were a F. word, and 'still wore its foreign dress.' Thus Farquhar has: 'Turn your head about with a janité air;' The Inconstant, Act i. β. The explanation that it 'wore its foreign dress' is really no explanation, since there is no such word in French, and it is not easy to say how it came about. The F. janité means a felly of a wheel, which has clearly nothing to do with the matter, but Cotgrave notes that this janité was also spelt genté, shewing confusion between initial gen- and jan-. The suffix -é is mere pseudo-French, and the word is not a pp. from a verb genter (there being no such verb). γ. The original is the F. gent, masc., gentie, fem., 'neat, spruce, fine, comely, well arranged, quaintly dressed, also gentle, pliant, soft, easie;' Cot. This word was actually borrowed by us, and appears as gent, spruce, gay, in Phillips (1706), Kersey, Bailey, &c., as well as in Spenser, F. Q. i. 9, 27. Or else we may suppose that janty is short for jantyl, an occasional F. spelling of gentil. δ. These two explanations are practically identical, since Littré shows that F. gent is merely an adaptation of F. gentil, rather than an independent formation from L. genitus. We are thus led to consider janty as being a mere doublet of gentle or genteel, which are in fact identical. Cf. 'So jimpily lac'd her genty waist;' Burns, Bonnie Ann.

JAW. I now believe that the words jowl and chaps, though allied to each other, are entirely unconnected with jaw; and that Dan. kjæve, a jaw (allied to A. S. ceaft) has nothing to do with O. Du. kauwe, the resemblance, such as it is, being purely accidental. I should refer chaps, chops, gape, jowl, jole (together with Dan. kjæve), to GABH, no. 90, p. 733; but chaw or jaw and chew are from the Teut. base KAU, to chew (Fick, iii. 38), which is perhaps allied to GU, to low, no. 103, p. 733. My mistake was due to confusing Dan. kjæve (base kaf-, the v being for f) with O. Du. kauwen (base kuw-, ku-). The connection between jaw and chew is obvious in the O. H. G. forms. Cf. O. H. G. chiwā, chiewā, chewā, M. H. G. kiuwe, chiuwe, kouwe, jaw, with O. H. G. chiwan, chiuwan, M. H. G. kiuwen, G. hauen, to chew. See Wackernagel, s. v. kiuwe. Palsgrave has chawe-bone, sb., and chawe, vb.

JEHOVAH. This form is due to the divine name being pointed, in the Heb. scriptures, with the vowels of another word. The original pronunciation was yahveh, the etymology of which is entirely unknown.—A. L. M.

JENNETING. In Hogg's Fruit Manual, 4th ed. p. 77, it is proposed to connect this with F. jean, John. He cites from J. B. Porta the following: 'Est genus alterum [pomorum] quod quia circa festum Divi Joannis maturiscit (sic), vulgus Melo de San Joannis dicitur.' And again, from Tragus, Hortorum, p. 522, 'Quæ apud nos prima maturantur, Sancti Johans Oppfell (sic), Latine, Præcocia mala dicuntur.' Cotgrave has: 'Pomme de S. Jean, or Hastivel, a soon-ripe apple called the St. John's apple.' This leaves little doubt as to the ultimate origin being from F. jean. There is also a pear called Amiré Joannet, or Admiré Joannet, also Joannet, Jeannette, Petit St. Jean, in German Johannisbirn, which 'ripens in July, so called from being ready for use in some parts of France about St. John's day, the 24th of June;' Hogg's Fruit Manual, p. 361.

Similarly the jenneting must have received its name from being in some places ripe on St. John's day, though in England it is not ripe till July. As to the form of the word, it answers best to F. jeanneton; for, although this is a feminine form, we have just seen that the early pear is called both Joannet and Jeannette. We find a mention of persionnelles, i. e. Jeannot pears, as early as in Piers Plowman, C. xiii. 221. It is much more likely that jenneting = jeanneton, than that the suffix -ing was afterwards added, for no intelligible reason.

JERK. We find jerts in the very sense of jerks, i. e. cuts with a whip, in Dodsley's O. Plays, ii. 194; also 'I jerted [i. e. smacked] my whip,' id. viii. 52.

JESSES. We actually find both gesse and gesses used as pl. forms in the Book of St. Albans, fol. b 5, back. 'Gesses for a hauke, getz;' Palsgrave. Hence M. E. gesse = F. jets, as I supposed; and jesses is a double plural.

JEW. Anglo-F. Jwe, Year-books of Edw. I., iii. 355; Geu, Stat. of the Realm, i. 221, an. 1276; pl. Jeus, id. i. 54, an. 1283. These forms correspond to an O. F. sing. form Jueu (see Scheler), from Lat. Judæum, acc. of Judæus. Scheler explains that Jueu subsequently became Juev, Juif.

JINGLE. Jink is actually the prov. E. word for chink; see glossaries of Craven dialect, Leic. (Evans), Northants. (Baker), and Halliwell. Palsgrave gives the sb. gyngle-geangle.

JOCKEY. We find Jockey for jack in 1632, in a Woman Never Vexed, in Dodsley's O. Plays, xii. 156; and earlier, in Skelton's Works, ed. Dyce, i. 185, l. 91. Cf. Shak. Rich. III. v. 3. 304.

JOG. Jog may be a mere corruption of shog, though it makes but little difference. We actually find j for initial sk in the form jeltron, put for sheltron, a shelter, or shield, in Hickscorner; Dodsley's O. Plays, i. 149.

JOHN DORY. On what authority the statement rests that this fish is called janitore in Venice (see Palmer, Folk-Etymology), I know not. If it be true, it has still nothing to do with the E. name as asserted by some. We already find, says Mr. Palmer, the following mention of the dory in pt. iii. l. 561 of the De Laudibus Divine Sapientie of Alexander Neckam, who died in 1217: 'Gustum doreæ quæ nomen sumpsit ab auro.' This is conclusive. We find mention of 'the goldfish or doreæ' in Holland, tr. of Pliny (1634), b. xxxi. c. 11; 'Dorrey, a see fyssh,' in Palsgrave (1530); also the Anglo-F. dore, a dory, in the Liber Albus, p. 234, and Low Lat. doracus in the Gloss. to the Liber Customarum. For the etymology of John, see Zany.

JORDAN. The river-name is rather (Heb.) than (Arab.) Heb. Yardén, i. e. flowing down; from the Heb. root yárad, to descend. (A. L. M.)

JUG. We actually find an expression parallel to 'jug of beer' in 'jack of beer,' which occurs in Dodsley's O. Plays, ed. Hazlitt, vii. 218, ix. 441. From the fact of jug being a female name, we also find jug, a mistress, a term of endearment, id. iv. 183, vi. 511, viii. 409, xii. 115.

JUNGLE. (Hind., -Skt.) 'Hind. Jangal, jungul (also in other dialects), a forest, a thicket, any tract overrun with bushes or trees;' H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 230. = Skt. jaṅgala, adj., dry, desert (as already given).

JUNK (1). 'Even whole junks' full, being a kind of barks made like unto our barges;' An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, ii. 125. This occurs in the account of Cavendish's voyage in 1586, written in 1588. The said junks were seen near Java.

JUTE. a substance resembling hemp. (Bengálí. -Skt.) 'The jute of commerce is the product of two plants of the order of Tiliaceæ, viz. Corchorus capsularis and Corchorus olitorius . . the leaves . . are employed in medicine . . dried leaves prepared for this purpose being found in almost every Hindu house in some districts of Bengal . . Its recognition as a distinct plant [from hemp] dates from the year 1795, when Dr. Roxburgh, Superintendent of the East India Company's Botanical Garden at Seebpoor, forwarded a bale prepared by himself, under its present name of jute;' Overland Mail, July 30, 1875, p. 17 (which contains a long article on Jute).—Bengálí jút, joot, 'the fibres of the bark of the Corchorus olitorius, much used for making a coarse kind of canvas, and the common ganni bags; it is also sometimes loosely applied to the plant;' H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 243. = Skt. jata (with cerebral t), matted hair, as worn by the god Śiva and by ascetics, hence a braid; of which a less usual form is jāta. It appears, from the Dict. by Böhtlingk and Roth, that this Skt. word was sometimes applied to the fibrous roots of a tree, descending from the branches, as in the case of the banyan, &c. Hence the extension of meaning to fibrous substances, and to jute. Cf. Malayálim jat, (1) the matted hair of Śhiva or of Hindu ascetics, (2) the fibrous roots of a tree descending from the branches; Bailey, Malayálim Dict., p. 304. See also a letter by J. S. Cotton in The Academy, Jan. 17, 1880.

KANGAROO. In Cook's Voyages, under the date July 14, 1770? [misprinted 1700], he says; 'this animal is called by the natives kangaroo.' See N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 58.

* KEELHAUL. (Scand. and E.) Also keelhale, 'to punish in the seaman's way, by dragging the criminal under water on one side of the ship and up again on the other;' Johnson. Formerly called keel-raking (Phillips). A less severe punishment was ducking at the main-yard (Phillips). From keel (1) and hale (2).

KERN (1), an Irish soldier. The derivation is from Irish ceatharnach, a soldier (the th and ch being hardly sounded). — Irish cath, a battle, whence also cathfear, a soldier (from fear, a man). So also Gael. ceatharnach, a soldier, fighting man (E. cateran), from cath, battle. And cf. W. cadarn, powerful. The Irish and Gael. cath, W. cad, battle, is cognate with A. S. heaðu, battle; see Fick, i. 56.

KERSEY. Palsgrave has 'Carsey clothe, cressy.' This is an earlier example; and helps to shew that Kersey is short for Kersey cloth.

* KESTREL, a base kind of hawk. (F., — L.) In Spenser, F. Q. ii. 3. 4; spelt castrel, Beaumont and Fletcher, Pilgrim, i. 1; kastril, Ben Jonson, Epicoene, iv. 4; see Nares. The t is excrement (as after s in whits-t, amongs-t); it stands for kes'el, short for kers'el. — O. F. quercecelle, 'a kastrell;' Cot. Put for *quercecelle, the regular dimin. of quercecelle, 'a kastrell,' Cot. — Lat. querquedula, a kind of teal; see Diez and Scheler. From the imitative ✓ KARK, to make a loud noise; cf. croak, creak, chirk, &c.

β. See also, in Cotgrave, the forms cercelle, a teal; cercerelle, a kestrel, teal; crecerelle, a kestrel; mod. F. crécérille. The form cercelle is mod. F. sarcelle; see Littré, under crécelle, crécérille, sarcelle; Diez, under cerceta, the Spanish form. The Ital. tristarello, a kestrel (Florio), stands for *cristarello; cf. Burgundian cristel, a kestrel, a form cited by Wedgwood. (See my letter to The Academy, Oct. 7, 1882, p. 262.)

* KHEDIVE, a prince. (F., — Pers.) A Turkish title given to the governor of Egypt; the word itself is, however, not Turkish, but borrowed from Persian. — F. Khédive. — Pers. khadiv, khidiv, khudiv, a king, a great prince, a sovereign, Rich. Dict. p. 601; spelt khidiv, a king, Palmer's Dict. col. 216, where the name for the viceroy of Egypt is given as khidewt. Cf. Pers. khodâ, God (Vullers, p. 663).

KIBE. The W. forms are cibi (fem. y gibi), and cibust. In N. Wales it is generally called llog ei rîa, snow-burning or inflammation. (D. Silvan Evans.)

KICK. The W. cic occurs in the Mabinogion in the sense of 'foot'; cicio, to kick, is colloquial. (D. Silvan Evans.)

KILDERKIN. The word occurs as early as 1410; 'a kylderkin of ale;' Fifty Earliest Eng. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 17, l. 16. See note to FIRKIN above.

KILT. Otherwise, it may be Celtic; see Cormac, Gloss. 47, s. v. celt. Celt, vestis, raiment. Cf. Irish cealt, clothes. (A. L. Mayhew.) I confess I doubt this; the explanation I have already given is more likely, as explaining both the Scottish kilt, to tuck up, and the Dan. kilte. The kilt is not exactly 'clothes,' but only a particular part of the dress. Rietz identifies the Swed. dialect kilträ sig, to tuck up one's clothes, with the Sc. to kilt up.

* KIOSK, a Turkish open summer-house, small pavilion. (Turk., — Pers.) In Byron, Corsair, iii. 1. Spelt kiosque in French. — Turk. kushk, köshk, a kiosk; Zenker's Dict. p. 774. — Pers. kushk, a palace, a villa; a portico, or similar projection in a palace, Rich. Dict. p. 1217; a palace, kiosk, Palmer's Dict. col. 496. Devic remarks that the i is due to the Turkish practice of inserting a slight i after k.

KIT-CAT. 'Immortal made, as Kit-cat by his pies;' W. King, Art of Cookery, let. viii. First pr. in 1708. This well exemplifies the etymology, from the name of a pastry-cook of that period.

KITE. The paper kite, as a toy, is mentioned in 1690; see Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, b. iv. c. 4. § 9. Named from a resemblance to a hovering kite or bird.

KNAP. Also cognate with G. knappen, to knap, crack; which see in Weigand. Cf. also Swed. knäpp, a crack, filip, snap; knäppa, to snap the fingers, filip, crack; Dan. knep, a crack, filip, snap. Knep: knack: clap: crack; all words of imitative origin, of which ✓ KARK is the type. See Root no. 59, p. 732. Hence it is needless to consider knack, knep, knock, knop as of Celtic origin; they may just as well be Teutonic.

KNAVE. Prob. (E.) Weigand, s. v. knabe, quotes from Dieffenbach an Old Gaulish form gnabat, one who is born, a son. This suggests that knave (like kn-ight, q. v.) is a derivative from ✓ GAN, to produce. If so, the latter part of A. S. en-afa or en-apa cannot be an ordinary Teut. suffix; but the word must be a compound of two substantives; and we may perhaps compare Goth. aba, a man, husband, and esp. Icel. afi, a grandfather, respecting which Vigfusson says that it is sometimes 'used in the sense of a boy or a son . . . cf. afi eptir afa, son after father, man after man.' It would certainly make good sense to suppose knave to mean 'born a man,' or 'man-child;' Chaucer uses knaue child for 'man-child,' C. T. 5142; and we may note that knaue is never applied to a female.

KNEEL. Compare A. S. knýlung, a kneeling. 'Accubitus, knýlung,' Wright's Voc. i. 41, col. 1.

KNOUT. Not (Russ.), but (Russ. — Scand.) Russ. knute is not Slavonic, but of Scand. origin. — Icel. knútr, a knot. See Thomsen, Anc. Russia and Scandinavia, 1877, p. 128. — A. L. M. Thus knout is a mere variant of Knot, q. v.

KNUCKLE. We may particularly remark the O. Du. knocke. Hexham gives: 'De knoest, knocke, ofte Weere van een boom, the knob or knot of a tree.' So also G. knocken, a knot, bunch.

LABURNUM. Perhaps Lat. laburnum is a variation of alburnum. Cf. 'F. abour, the cytisus, laburnum, from Lat. alburnum;' Brachet. And see Catholicon Anglicum, p. 6, note 3.

LAC (2). The sense of laksha, viz. 100,000, has reference to the number of lac-insects in a nest; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 308. See Lac (1). Wilson adds that the insect constructs its nest in numerous small cells of a resinous substance known as shell-lac.

LADE (1). This strong verb deserves fuller treatment. The pp. laden occurs in M. E. in Genesis and Exodus, ed. Morris, l. 1800; Richard Cœur de Lion, l. 1389. The cognate forms are: Du. laden, to lade, load; Icel. hláða; Dan. lade; Swed. ladda; Goth. hlathan, only found in the comp. af-hlathan; G. be-laden, O. H. G. hladan. All from the Teut. base HLATH, to lade; Fick, iii. 87. Cf. Russ. klade, a load, answering to a Teut. base HLAD.

LAG. We again find lag, late, in Jacob and Esau, v. 5, in Dodsley's O. Plays, ii. 252, where Esau is said 'of blessing to come lag.' Hence the verbal use, as in: 'Death shall not long lag after him;' id. x. 48.

LAMA (1). In a Thibetan Dict. by H. A. Jäschke, at p. 650, we are told that the word for 'priest' is blama.

LANDSCAPE. 'I give also vnto her La[dishi]pp the landskipp inamiled vpon gold which is in the Dutch cabinet in my closett;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 216 (A.D. 1648).

LANYARD. Spelt lanzer, Catholicon Anglicum, p. 208. M. E. laneyr. Trevisa, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon, v. 369.

LAP (1). The A. S. lapan occurs in Ælfric's Grammar, ed. Zupitza, p. 177, l. 11: 'Lambo, ic liccige oððe lapige,' i.e. I lick or lap. Also in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 184, l. 13. Cf. also Du. leppen, to sip; Swed. läppa, to lap.

LAPSE. Cf. Anglo-F. laps de temps, lapse of time; Stat. of the Realm, i. 318, an. 1351.

LAPWING. Actually spelt leapwynke in Wycliffe, Levit. xi. 19; cf. lapwynches, pl., in Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, ed. Arber, p. 60, l. 24. As late as 1530, we find lapwynke in Palsgrave.

LARBOARD. In Hackluyt's Voyages, 1598, i. 4, we find the spellings leereboord and steereboord.

LARCH. Mentioned in Turner's Names of Herbes (1548); p. 46 (E. D. S.). He gives the E. name as larche-tree, the F. as du large, and the G. as ein larchen baume [rather ein lärchen-baum]. Roquefort gives O. F. larege, now obsolete.

LIASSO. Not (Port., — L.), as marked in my former edition, but (Span., — L.). A correspondent from Mexico has solved my difficulty; he says that 'in Mexico the masses of the people give z the sound of s, and sound c just as we do;' and that 'lasso has long been in use in Texas,' &c. In other words, lasso was borrowed from Spanish at a time when z had the sound of s; and I observe, accordingly, that Minshew's Span. Dict. (1623) gives the form lasso as well as lazo. It certainly stands to reason that lasso ought to be Spanish, from its known use; but I did not understand how that was phonetically possible, and therefore supposed it must be from the cognate Port. lago.

LAST (1). (E.) Curiously enough, the particular phrase at last did not originate from the adj. last, but last is here a totally different word, and belongs to last (2). The phr. at last is due to A. S. on lást, or on lásð. See the phr. on lásð = at last, in Gregory's Pastoral Care, ed. Sweet, p. 21, l. 10, and Mr. Sweet's note at p. 474, where he distinctly points out that at last has nothing to do with late. This suggests that Icel. d lesti, at last, stands for d leisti, leisti being dative of leistr.

LAST (2). In Wright's Vocab. i. 26, we find the A. S. glosses: 'Cernui, fót-leaste, læs-hosum; Caligarius, læst-weorht [i.e. last-wring, last-maker]; Ocrea, vel musticula, læste.' And again, at p. 181, the Low Lat. quibiale is glossed by 'lest of a boote,' and formipedia by 'lest,' in the 14th century.

LATH. E. Fries. latte, lat, a lath; F. latte, from O. Low G. The G. form is unmodified. The Teut. base is LAT = Aryan ✓ RAD, to split; see root no. 297, p. 740. Thus the sense is 'that which is split off;' cf. Skt. rada, a splitting; also E. rodent and rat.

LATHER. 'Nitrum, leððor;' Wright's Voc. ii. 62, col. 1.

LAIVISH. Cf. 'Those, who did prodigally lavasse out and waste their substance or goodes vpon cokes' [cooks]; Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Diogenes, § 160.

LAW. Though the form lagu occurs in A.S., the word is, practically, rather (Scand.) than (E.); as appears from the use and history of the word.

LAWN (2), a sort of fine linen. (F.) Lawn was certainly known in England earlier than A.D. 1562, the date given by Stow for its introduction. We already find 'Laune lynen, crespé' in Palsgrave (1530); and, as early as 1502, lawn is enumerated among the 'wares of Flanders,' in Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 205. It will be observed that the orig. name was not laune only, but also Laune lynen. Hence the very great probability that it took its name from Laon, the place of its manufacture. Laon, not far N. W. of Rheims, was spelt Lan at that period; see Calendar of State Papers, vi. 203, 224; and Ménage notes that it is pronounced Lan (in French). Again, Baret says that lawn was also 'called cloth of Remes,' i. e. Rheims. At the present time, the principal manufactures of Laon are in woollen and worsted goods; but it may once have been otherwise. Cambray and Tournay are at no very great distance; see note on Cambrie above. The Lat. name of the town is given as Lundunum or Lugdunum, where the termination -dunum is Celtic; see Down (2).

LAYER. I now suspect (and I find Dr. Stratmann is of the same opinion) that layer is nothing but another (and worse) spelling of lair, due to that confusion between lay and lie in popular speech which every one must have observed; the spelling layere for 'lair' has been already noted, s.v. Lair. I therefore now propose to amend the article accordingly.

LEAGUE (2). 'Xvi. furlong make a French leuge;' Arnold's Chron., 1502, ed. 1811, p. 173. The spelling leuge verifies the etymology from L. leuga.

LEAK. Cf. 'þæt klece scip' = the leaky ship; Ælfred's tr. of Gregory's Past. Care, ed. Sweet, p. 437, l. 15. The initial h is remarkable, and prob. original.

LEAN (1). By the Swed. läna, I mean Swed. läna sig, to lean, given in Widegren (1788), and copied into the Tauchnitz Dict. The usual Swed. läna means 'to lend.' Cf. however, länstol, an easy chair, chair to lean back in.

LEASH. In the Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 6, col. 2, we are told it is correct to say 'a Brace of grehoundis, of ij;' and 'a Lece of grehoundis, of iij.'

LECTERN. The Anglo-F. lettron, a lectern, occurs in the Will of John of Gaunt; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 152. (The editor explains it, quite wrongly, by 'catafalque'.)

LEES. 'Put thereto lyes of swete wyne;' Arnold's Chron., 1502, ed. 1811, p. 189. Thus the word was at first spelt lyes [= lies], in strict accordance with its derivation from F. lies, pl. of lie.

LEFT. The etymology here given was derived from Mr. Sweet. See Anglia, vol. iii. p. 155 (1880), where the same account is given by him. He notes that lyft is an i-stem = *lupiti, from the ✓ RUP, to break; see Schmidt, Vocalismus, i. 159. From the same root we have lop and lib, as already pointed out. Certainly left is not derived from the pp. of the verb to leave, of which the usual M. E. form was laft.

LEMON. The pl. lemondis occurs as early as in Arnold's Chronicle, ed. 1811, p. 234 (ab. 1502). Limon-trees; Bacon, Essay 46.

LETTUCE. Cf. Low Lat. letusa, glossed by M. E. letuse, Wright's Voc. i. 265, col. 2. This points to a Low Lat. *lactucia, as a derivative from lactuca. We find A.S. lactuca, borrowed immediately from Latin, in Exod. xii. 8.

LEVEE. So spelt also in Phillips (1706). But the English were certainly wrong in adopting this form; the F. has only lever (infin.) in this sense. 'Le lever, le moment où le monarque reçoit dans sa chambre, après qu'il est levé;' and 'Petit lever et grand lever du roi, dans l'étiquette de l'ancien régime;' Littré.

LEVERET. Cf. the Anglo-F. pl. leveres, hares, Gaimar's Chron. 6239.

LEVY. Both the sb. and vb. occur rather early. 'That the [they] make levy of my dettys;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 43 (A.D. 1463). 'After the seyde money is levyed;' id. p. 49 (A.D. 1467).

LEWD. The A. S. word should rather be written læwede. 'Laiicus, læwede man;' Wright's Voc. i. 72, l. 8.

LICORICE. Anglo-F. lycorys, Liber Albus, p. 224.

LID. The A.S. hlid is directly derived from hlid-en, pp. of hlidan, to shut, cover, as already given.

LIEUTENANT. The pronunciation as leftenant is being new. The pl. lyeftenauntis occurs in Arnold's Chron., ab. 1502, ed. 1811, p. 120; and lyeftenaunt in the Book of Noblesse, pr. in 1475, as quoted in the Catholicon Anglicum, p. 223, note 1. The Anglo-F. lieu-tenant, a deputy, occurs A.D. 1299, in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 131.

LIFEGUARD. Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, still clings to the needless paradox of translating life by 'body.' As he cannot get the word out of the German, he suggests Swedish. But the Swed. word is lifvakt. Neither is it Dutch; for Sewel, in his Eng.-Du. Dict., gives 'Life-gard, een Lyfwacht.' The mod. Du. lijfgarde proves nothing, as it may have been borrowed from E. Neither Swed. nor Du. freely combines Teut. words with F.; such combination is quite an E. peculiarity.

LIGHTER. sb. Occurs in Cotgrave, s.v. gabarre.

LILAC. Bacon mentions 'the Lelache Tree;' Essay 46. 'The Persian lilac was cultivated in England about 1638, the common lilac about 1597;' Davies, Supp. Glossary.

LIMP (2). Palsgrave has: 'lympe hault, boiteux.' If lympe-hault is here a compound word, it remarkably confirms the A.S. lemp-healt. The Icel. lempinn, lempiligr, means 'pliable, gentle.' There is perhaps some connection between this Icel. word and A.S. lemp, but it is not easily traced. There is excellent authority for the A.S. word, for 'Lurdus, lemp-halt;' occurs in a gloss of the eighth century; in Wright's Voc. ii. 113, col. 1. I suppose lurdus = Gk. λορδός, stooping, bending forward, with reference to a decrepit gait.

LINNET. 'Carduelis, linet-wige;' Wright's Voc. ii. 13 (11th cent.). This explains the form linetwige as compounded of linet (from A.S. līn, L. linum, flax), and wige, a creature that moves quickly about, as if it were 'flax-hopper.' Perhaps our linnet is merely this word shortened. It makes little difference, since linnet is ultimately Latin.

LISTEN. Cf. also Swed. lyssna, to listen; prob. put for *lystna. On the other hand, we find Dan. lytte, to listen, prob. by assimilation from lyste.*

LITTER (2). 'Tho laye they down on a lytier made of strawe;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 27, ed. Arber, p. 61, l. 1. 'Leyde hym vpon a lyter of heye;' id. c. 42; p. 116, l. 26.

LITTER (3). Not (Scand.), but (F., -L.) We find 'a litter of welpis,' i. e. whelps, in the Boke of St. Albans, leaf f 6, col. 2. Really the same as litter (2). Wedgwood says: 'litter itself (F. litière) is used in the sense of bedding or resting-place, as: "the inn Where he and his horse littered" [rested]; Habington, Castara, pt. ii., to Mr. E.C., l. 24. From hence the sense of a brood of young may arise by a metaphor similar to that seen in F. accoucher, or in the E. expressions of being brought to bed or being in the straw.' So in the Prompt. Parv., we have 'lytere, or strowynge of horse,' and 'lytere, or forthe-brynggyng of beestys.' I was misled by Cleasby's Icel. Dict., where litr is equated to E. litter, whereas the sense of it is rather 'lair'; whilst litrask is to prepare or seek a lair, to go to rest (not 'to litter,' as it is explained to be). (The Icel. litr and F. litière are both ultimately from the same root.)

LIVELONG. Palsgrave has: 'All the lyflonge day, tout au long du jour, or tout du long de la journee;' reprint, p. 853, col. 2.

LO, interj. Mr. Sweet remarks: 'Lo cannot come from O.E. [A.S.] lā, because of the rime lo: do in the Cursor Mundi [l. 14976]. The form low in the oldest text of the Ancien Riwe [no reference, but lo occurs at p. 52, l. 21, and low in St. Katharine, l. 849] points to an O.E. *lōw or *lōg, which latter may be a variation of lōc, which occurs in the Chronicle, 'hi ferdon loc hu hi woldon,' an. 1009, Laud MS., ed. Earle, p. 142, where the other MSS. have loca, the imperative of lōcian, to look.—Phil. Soc. Proceedings, June 3, 1881.

LOACH. We find lochefissk in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 355, an. 1357. Littré cites no authority for F. loche earlier than the 13th century. Cf. Ital. locca, locchia, 'a cob or gudgeon fish;' Florio.

LOAN. The A. S. form lān occurs in lān-land, lit. loan-land, usually lān-land, in Cod. Dipl. ed. Kemble, iii. 165, l. 5.

LOATHSOME. Mr. Sweet remarks: the O.E. [A.S.] lāð has simply the meaning of hostility, and there does not appear to be any such word as lāðsum. Loathsome was probably formed from wlatsum, by substitution of the familiar lāð for wlat.—Phil. Soc. Proceedings, June 3, 1881. This is probable enough; since M.E. wlatsum went out of use, though occurring in Chaucer, C.T., Group B, 3814; whilst loathsome does not occur, according to Stratmann, earlier than in the Promptorium Parvulorum, A.D. 1440. At the same time, I have already remarked that the A.S. lāðlic = E. loathly; and I may add that Stratmann gives 15 references for M.E. lāðlic, which had as nearly as possible the same sense as our loathsome. Cf. 'Lothsum, idem quod lothly;' Prompt. Parv. Hence the argument from the original sense of A.S. lāð is really of no force.

LOBSTER. The etymology given is strongly corroborated by the 8th century A.S. gloss: 'Locusta, lopust;' Wright's Vocab. ii. 113, col. 1. Here lopust is manifestly a mere attempt at pronouncing Lat. locusta, and the later A. S. forms lopystre, loppestre are mere extensions of lopest.

LOCKRAM. 'A new rayle [night-dress] and a lockerom kercher;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 147 (A.D. 1556).

LOITER. Dele sect. β to end of article. Cf. E. Friesic loteren, lotern, to loiter, discussed by Koolman at p. 534. He suggests that the apparent base LUT is merely formed by 'gradation' from a base LAT, and that the real connection is with Late, q. v. Wedgwood well compares Icel. lötta, to loiter (already noticed by me in my List of E. words allied to Icelandic), from latr, slow, lazy.

LOO. 'Pam in lanteraloo;' Farquhar, Sir Harry Wildair, ii. 2 (1701). This shews the full form.

LOOM (2). Perhaps (F., = L.), rather than Scand. The M. E. lumen, to shine, answers still better to F. lumer, 'to shine, to give light, yield or cast a light'; Cotgrave (who adds the example la chandelle lume mal, the candle burns dimly). Sigart gives the Walloon lumer de z'eu, to hold eggs up to the light, to test them. The F. lumer is now only preserved in the comp. allumer. — Lat. luminare, to illumine; whence F. lumer, short for *lumer; see allumer in Brachet, and cf. F. lumière from luminaria. — Lat. lumen, light; see Luminous. This brings us back, by a different road, to the same root as before.

LOOP. Palsgrave has: 'Loupe in a towne, wall, or castell, creneau; Loupe to holde a button, fermeau.'

LORIMER. a maker of horses' bits, spurs, &c. (F., = L.) Spelt lorimer, loriner, in Blount (1674) and in Phillips. Blount notes that lorimer occurs an. 1 Rich. II. cap. 12. Palsgrave has: 'Loremar, that maketh byttes, esperonnier.' And see Liber Albus, p. 736 of the orig. edition. The simple sb. lorem, a bit, occurs in the Cursor Mundi, 25464. Loriner is the better form, as it agrees with Anglo-F. lorein, a bit; see Liber Custumarum, p. 79. — O. F. lorimier, given by Roquefort; later form lormier, 'a maker of nails, spurs, &c.', a word most used for a spurrier; Cot. Put for *lorimier; cf. E. loriner above. — O. F. lorein, lorain, rein, bridle, bit; Roquefort. — Low Lat. lorenum, loranum, a rein, bit; Ducange. Extended from Lat. lorum, a thong, a rein; so that loranum meant 'that which belongs to the rein,' hence a bit. β. The Lat. lorum is supposed to stand for *wlorum or *walorum, as is probable from the corresponding Gk. ἑλκρον, a rein (commonly used in the pl., like Lat. lora). — ✓WAR, later WAL, to turn; cf. Lat. wol-uere, Gk. ἐλ-εῖν; so that lora = the instruments for turning horses. See lormier in Scheler; Littré cannot understand the in in this word, though Scheler clearly explains it as being substituted for n. Cf. F. étameur, a tinman, from étain, tin.

LOT. There seem to have been two distinct forms, viz. A.S. hlōt and A.S. hlȳte or hlȳt; the Icel. hlutr was orig. hlautr. The forms hlȳte and hlautr, together with G. loos and Goth. hlauts, are from a diphthongal base HLAUT, from the Teut. root HLUT.

LOUNGE. I should have said that I suppose lungis, once a common word with us, to have been mistaken for a pl. form (as if = loungeurs), whence the sing. loungeur, and lastly the verb lounge, were evolved. It will be observed that loungeurs is the form in The Guardian, in 1713. A large number of false forms have arisen from similar mistakes about the 'number' of substantives. The evolution of the form tweezers (see Tweezers) is a still more striking instance.

LUKEWARM. Cf. Swed. dial. ly, tepid; the ordinary Swed. word is lūm. The Danish word is lunken, corresponding to Swed. dial. lunken (Rietz).

LUNGE. The etymology is verified by comparing the Walloon alonge, sb., a stagger, movement made by a drunken man to recover his equilibrium (or, as we might say, a lunge). The same sb. means a piece put on to a table to lengthen it, showing the connection with L. longus. See Sigart's Dict.

LURCH (1). Lorcher = pilferer. 'Ye, but thorowe false lorchers;' Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 98 (A.D. 1528).

LURCH (3). Palsgrave has: 'Lurcher, an exceeding eater, galiffre.' Also: 'I lurtche, as one dothe his felowes at meate with eatynge to hastyly, je briffe.'

LYE. 'Lixa, leak;' Wright's Voc. ii. 52, col. 1.

MACAW. Spelt mockaw in Gay, The Toilette, l. 9; The Espousal, l. 15.

MACE (2). Cf. Anglo-F. maces, spice, Liber Albus, p. 230.

MAD. Also M. E. med, Cursor Mundi, 24886. Note the following glosses. 'Ineptus, gemédid;' Wright's Voc. ii. 111, col. 2. 'Fatue, gemád;' id. 72, col. 2. 'Amens, geméd;' id. 5, col. 2. 'Vanus, gemáed;' Vecors, gemáad;' id. 123, col. 1 (8th century). Referred by Fick, iii. 237, to the ✓MI, to diminish.

MADEIRA, a sort of wine. (Port., = L.) In Shak. 1 Hen. IV. i. 2. 128. So named from the island of Madeira, off the N.W.

coast of Africa. The name is Port., and signifies that the island is well-wooded. — Port. madeira, wood, timber. Cf. Span. madera (the same). — Lat. materia, stuff, wood, timber; see Matter (1). See Diez, p. 465.

MAIL (BLACK), a forced tribute. (F., = L.) Mail is a Scottish term for rent. Jamieson cites the phr. burrow-mailles, duties payable within boroughs, from the Acts of Jas. I. c. 8 (A.D. 1424). Black-maill is mentioned in the Acts of Jas. VI. c. 21 (1567), and in the Acts of Elizabeth, an. 43, cap. 13, as a forced tribute paid to moss-troopers; see Jamieson and Blount. Spelman is right in supposing that it meant black rent or black money, a jocose allusion to tribute paid in cattle, &c., as distinct from rent paid in silver or white money; Blount shows that the term black money occurs in 9 Edw. III. cap. 4, and white money is not uncommon. Blount also cites the term black-rents. — F. maille, 'a French halfpenny;' Cot. O. Fr. maaille, meaille. — Low Lat. medalia; see Medal, of which this mail is a doublet. ¶ Not from A. S. mál (E. mole); nor from A. S. mél (E. meal).

MAIM. M. E. y-mayheyed, pp. P. Plowman, B. xvii. 189 (foot-note). Cf. Anglo-F. mahaigener, Lai d'Havelok, l. 730; manaym, sb., Liber Albus, p. 281.

MAINOUR. (F. = L.) In the phr. 'taken with the mainour,' or later, 'taken in the manner;' see 1 Hen. IV. ii. 4. 347. See note to Manner, p. 352. We find pris ou meinoure (where ou = F. avec), Stat. of the Realm, i. 30, an. 1275. Blount, in his Nomolexicon, explains mainour as meaning 'the thing that a thief steals;' and 'to be taken with the mainour,' as 'with the thing stolen about him, flagrante delicto.' It is lit. 'with the manœuvre,' and therefore refers rather to the act than the thing; see Cotgrave, s. v. flagrant; E. Webbe, Travels, 1590, ed. Arber, p. 28. The Anglo-F. meineuvre, also mainoure (Stat. Realm, i. 161) answers to O. F. maineuvre (Littré). See Manœuvre.

MAJORDOMO. Puttenham, in his Art of Poesie, 1589, b. iii. c. 4 (ed. Arber, p. 158) notes that Maioi-domo 'is borrowed of the Spaniard and Italian, and therefore new and not vsual, but to them that are acquainted with the affaires of Court.' The Ital. is major-domo, but the E. word was more likely borrowed from Spanish, being in use at the court of Elizabeth, and perhaps of Mary.

MALARIA. The reference to Debonair requires a word of comment, since the Ital. aria is there used in a very different sense. Under aria, Florio refers to aere; and he explains aere to mean 'the element aire, a countenance, a look, a cheere, an aspect, a presence or app[er]ance of a man or woman; also, a tune, a sound, a note or an ayre of musicke or any ditty.' This great range of meanings is very remarkable.

MALL (2). The full form pall-mall is not (F., = L.), as stated inadvertently, but (F., = Ital., = O. H. G. and L.); however, mall is (F., = L.). See N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 29, where Dr. Chance shews that it means, literally, 'mallet-ball' or 'mall-ball'; cf. E. foot-ball. Prob. so called to distinguish it from an earlier game of palla, or ball. It also appears that the Mall was a later name than Pall Mall, being a mere abbreviation. Paille-maille is mentioned as the name of a game as early as abt. 1641; see Eng. Garner, v. 283. Waller speaks of the Mall in his poem On St. James's Park. ¶ We may note that Weigand, s. v. Ball, derives Ital. palla from Gk. πᾶλλα, contrary to Diez and Scheler.

MAMMA. 'The babe shall now begin to tattle and call hir Mamma;' Euphues and his Ephoebus, ed. Arber, p. 129 (A.D. 1579).

MAMMOTH, l. 17. The quotation is quite correctly made, but 'horns' should certainly be 'bones.' The Russian for a bone is koste.

MANCHINEEL, a W. Indian tree. (Span., = L.) 'Manchinelo-tree, a tree that grows wild in the woods of Jamaica, the fruit of which is as round as a ball;' Phillips, ed. 1706. [Mahn gives an Ital. form mancinello, but I cannot find it; it must be quite modern, and borrowed from Spanish; the name, like many W. Indian words, is certainly Spanish, not Italian.] — Span. manzanillo, a little apple-tree; hence, the manchineel tree, from the apple-like fruit; dimin. of Span. manzana, an apple, also a pomel. Cf. Span. manzanal, an orchard of apple-trees. — Lat. Matiana, fem. of Matianus, adj.; we find Matiana mala, and Matiana poma, applied to certain kinds of apples. The adj. Matianus, Matian, is from Lat. Matius, the name of a Roman gens (White).

MANCIPLE, a purveyor, esp. for a college. (F., = L.) Not obsolete; still in use in Oxford and Cambridge. M. E. manciple, Chaucer, C. T. 569. The i is an insertion, as in principle, syllable, participle. — O. F. manciple, a slave (Roquefort). Cf. O. Ital. mancipio, 'a slave, vassal, subject, captive, manciple, farmer, bailly,' &c.; Florio. — Lat. mancipium, a slave, orig. possession, property, lit. a taking in the hand; see Maine, Ancient Law, p. 317. Cf. Lat. mancipi, crude form of manceps, a taker in hand. — Lat. man-, stem of man-us, the hand; cip-, weakened form of cap-, base of cap-ere, to take. See Manual and Captive.

MANDOLIN, a kind of guitar. (F., -Ital., -Gk.) Added by Todd to Johnson's Dict. = F. mandoline, a mandolin. = Ital. mandolino, dimin. of mandola, a kind of guitar (there were several kinds). Mandola is a corruption of mandora (cf. F. mandore), and, again, this is for bandora = Ital. pandora. See further under Banjo.

MANGLE (1). In Langtoft's Chron. i. 254, we find Anglo-F. mahangle, with the sense of 'maimed.' This suggests that mangle may be from an O.F. mahangler, frequentative form of O.F. mahaigner, to maim. See Maim at p. 348, and note on Maim above.

MANGROVE. (Hybrid; Malay and E.) 'A sort of trees called mangroves,' Eng. Garner, vii. 371 (ab. 1689). My belief is that the second syllable is nothing but the E. word grove, and has reference to the peculiar growth of the trees, which form a close thicket of some extent. Again, the tree is sometimes called the mangle; so that mangrove may well stand for mang-grove or 'grove of mangs or mangles.' The syllable mang is due to the Malay name for the tree, viz. manggi-manggi; see Pijnappel's Malay-Dutch Dict. p. 133.

MANNA. The word mdn, what?, is not Hebrew, but Aramaic of late date.—A. L. M. This disposes of the former of the two explanations; but the latter is probable. See Gesenius, 8th ed. p. 478; Speaker's Comment. i. 321.

MANTEL-PIECE. The origin is also clearly shewn in Palsgrave, who gives: 'Mantyltre of a chymney, manteau d'une cheminee.'

MANUAL. M. E. manuel, in phr. 'syne manuall,' i.e. sign manual, A.D. 1428: in Earl. E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 83, l. 18.

MARCESCENT. Prof. Postgate remarks that the 'fundamental meaning of marcescere is not so much 'to begin to die' or 'to decay' as 'to become soft, flabby, squashy, to begin to rot,' which is the sign of decay.' This agrees still more closely with Gk. μαλκός, which (as we learn from Hesychius) was the orig. form of μαλακός, soft. The orig. sense of μαλκός was 'beaten soft,' from the base MARK, to beat, pound, as already given. The same base accounts for Lat. marcus, a hammer; see March (2).

MARGRAVE. As to the etymology of G. graf, see the long note in Max Müller, Lect. on Language, ii. 281. On p. 284 we read, 'whatever its etymology,' says Waitz, no mean authority, 'the name of graf is certainly German.' My suggestion amounts to this, that the supposed Teutonic origin of graf seems to depend, in some measure, on the assumption that the G. graf and the A.S. gerífa are related words, an assumption which renders the whole question much more obscure, and is entirely unwarranted. In the A.S. gerífa, ge- is a mere prefix, whilst the German word appears to begin with gr. Kluge connects G. graf with Goth. ga-grefis, a decree (Luke, ii. 1).

MARTELLO TOWER. Sir G. C. Lewis, Letters, 1862, p. 412, states that the story goes that these towers were called torri da martello because the watchmen gave the alarm by causing a hammer to strike a bell. That this is the right account is rendered probable by the following passages in Ariosto's Orlando, kindly sent me by an American correspondent. 'E la campana martellando tocca Onde il soccorso vien subito al porto'; x. 51. And again: 'Le campane si sentino a martello Di spezzi colpi e spaventosi tocche'; xiv. 100. The fact that there was also a tower at Mortella has, probably, nothing to do with the name. See quotations in Davies, Select Glossary.

MARTEN. Spelt martron, Book of St. Albans, fol. e 1; and in Caxton. tr. of Reynard, c. 31, p. 79, l. 28.

MARTINET. I find 'you martinet rogue' in Wycherley's Plain Dealer, iii. 1 (A.D. 1677).

MASK. I have shewn that mask ought rather to be masker, as Sir T. More spells it. Cf. 'the king his Master [Francis I.] woll come, . . and see your Grace [Henry VIII.] in Calais in maskyr'; A.D. 1519; see Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 143.

MASTIFF. Wedgwood objects that the O.F. mestif mentioned by Cotgrave, and cited at p. 357, above, is a totally different word, and has nothing to do with it. We must therefore distinguish between M. E. mestyf, 'hounde,' given as a variant of mastyf in the Prompt. Parv. and O.F. mesif in Cotgrave. [The latter is a variant of O.F. mestis, mod. F. métis, mongrel; Littre, s.v. métis, gives examples of both forms; we even find M. E. mastis, a mongrel, in the Cath. Anglicum. O.F. mestis corresponds to a Low Lat. type *mixtitus, and mestif to *mixtivus, both from mixtum, supine of miscere, to mix.] The M. E. mastif answers to an O.F. type *mastif, which may be regarded as a variant of O.F. mastin, 'a mastive,' &c. as already given. As to the etymology of O.F. mastin (which occurs in Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 283), I have followed that given by Diez, and generally adopted. B. Wedgwood makes the suggestion, that it may be of Teut. origin, from G. mast, mast, feeding, fattening; cf. mastochs, a fatted ox, &c.; mästen, to fatten, to cram. We find the following M. E. words in the Prompt. Parv., viz. 'mast-hog, mastid-swyne, maialis; mastyn, beestys, sagino, impinguo; mestyf [perhaps for mestid] hogge or swyne, maialis.' Way notes (p. 334) that in the Craven dialect a great dog is still called a masty. Halliwell also gives masty, very large and big; and masty dog, mastiff, occurring in Hobson's Jest, p. 11, Du Bartas, p. 46. This would seem to suggest that the word mastiff is, after all, a native word, and, in fact, a corruption of masty, due to confusion with the O.F. mestif, a mongrel. Masty is a mere derivative of Mast (2), q. v.; and the sense must then have changed from that of 'fattened by mast' to fat, large, big. There is worse confusion in the absurd form 'mestyf hogge,' which Way notes as occurring in two MSS.; where a word formed from A.S. mæstan, to fatten, is turned into a hybrid compound by the addition of the F. suffix -if (Lat. -ivus). But I am not convinced that Wedgwood is right in this.

MATE (1). We also find Low G. maat, a companion, O. Swed. mat, müt, a companion, comrade (Ihre).

MATRESS. 'Lego eidem Roberto j. matras et j. par. blankets,' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 11 (A.D. 1441); also spelt matras A.D. 1424, in Earliest E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 56.

MAUDLIN. The Heb. migdol is from the root gadal, to be great or high (Gesenius).

MAUND, a basket. (E.) This word, now nearly obsolete, occurs as early as the 8th century, in the gloss: 'Qualus, mand;' Wright's Voc. i. 118, col. 2. + Du. mand, a basket, hamper. + Prov. G. mand, mande, manne, a basket (Flügel); whence F. manne. Root obscure.

MEDLEY. Cf. Anglo-F. medlee, a combat, Life of Edw. Conf. p. 15, l. 5; medle, Langtoft, i. 300; meslee, Havelok, 1041.

MEMENTO. 'To haue mynde [remembrance] on vs . . in his [the priest's] memento;' Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 18. 'Remembryng you in oure memento;' Roy, Rede Me, p. 85. It was thus an ecclesiastical term, having reference to the remembrance of benefactors in the priest's saying of mass.

MENIVER. Cf. Anglo-F. menivier, Liber Albus, p. 283; Stat. of the Realm, i. 381, an. 1363.

MESSANGER. Cf. Anglo-F. messenger, Polit. Songs, p. 243, an. 1307; messenger, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 210.

METROPOLIS, l. 3. The statement 'except in modern popular usage' is objected to; I am quite ready to give it up. I believe I adopted the idea from an article in the Saturday Review, written in a very decisive tone. The original meaning is well known. 'And therof is metropolis called the chief citee, where the Archbishop of any province hath his see, and hath all the other diocesses of that prouince subiect to him, as Caunterbury and Yorke here in Englande;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Diogenes, § 110.

MIEN. Possibly (F., -C.), rather than (F., -Ital., -Lat.) Used by Waller, in l. 4 of a poem entitled 'These Verses were writ in the Tasso of Her Royal Highness.' Wedgwood thinks that meane in Spenser, vi. 7. 39 cannot be the same word. Perhaps not; for Spenser frequently uses words amiss, and he may have meant it as short for demean, i. e. demeanour; see F. Q. vi. 6. 18. Again, he objects that the Ital. mina was borrowed from French; for this he adduces the authority of Florio (i. e. in the edition of 1611; for the first edition of Florio omits the word). The F. mine is not known to be earlier than the 15th century. Wedgwood suggests a derivation from Bret. min, 'the face, visage, countenance of a man, snout of quadrupeds, beak of birds, point of land; where the wider acceptance of the Breton form makes it extremely improbable that it is borrowed from the French.' And he further compares W. mingam, wry-mouthed, mingamu, to make a grimace, minial, to move the lips, &c. If these, as appears, be of genuine Celtic origin, we may perhaps compare Lat. minari, to project, minae, projecting points, presumably from MAN, to project, no. 261, p. 739. This leads us back to the same root as before, and it is just possible that the Ital. mena, conduct, may thus be remotely connected with mien. β. It will be found that Scheler refers mine directly to the same original as F. se mener, i. e. to the Low Lat. minare, from Lat. minari; this makes the connection much closer, and would make the word to be (F., -L.) The difficulty of the word is admitted. The Prov. mena, manner, kind (see Bartsch), deserves consideration. If this Prov. mena = F. mine, the connection with se mener is established.

MILDEW. 'Nectar, hauig, oððe mildeáw;' Wright's Voc. ii. 61, col. 2. M. E. mildeu = honey; O. E. Hom. i. 269, l. 3.

MILLINER. The derivation from Milan may be safely accepted. See examples in Palmer's Folk-Etymology. E.g. in the Dialogues printed at the end of Minshew's Span. Dict. p. 13, a lady asking for the finest millinery is told that 'in this chest shall your worship see the principallest that is, all is worke of Milan.' And again, 'great Millan [thrives] by silk and all curious works;' Burton, Anat. of Melancholy, p. 53 (16th edition). Milan = Ital. Milano, Lat. Mediolanum, a Celtic place-name; see Bacmeister, Kelt. Briefe, pp. 71, 102.

MINX. Also applied to a lap-dog or pet dog, in accordance with the derivation given. 'A little mynse [pet dog] ful of playe;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, 1542 (ed. 1877, p. 143).

MISER. Cf. the following: 'Aristippus saied, Euen I it is, miserable and wretched creature that I am, and a more miser then I, the kyng of the Persians;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Aristippus, § 62. So also in the same, Diogenes, § 92.

MISSIVE. King Edw. IV. employs the phr. 'our lettres missives'; A. D. 1477. See Original Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 17.

MISTY (2). (F., = L., = Gk.) In the phrase 'mistiness of language,' we have a totally different idea. A man's language is misty when it is mystic or mysterious; and in this case, misty is a mere corruption of mystic. Accordingly, in the Prompt. Parv., we find a distinction made between 'mysty, nebulosus' and 'mysty, or prevey to mannes wytte, misticus.' So also mysty, mystic, in Wyclif, Eng. Works, ed. Matthew, p. 344; and mystily, mystically, in the same, p. 343. Cf. mistier, with the double meaning, in P. Plowman, B. x. 181. See Palmer, Folk-Etymology. For the loss of the final letter, cf. E. jolly from O. F. jolif.

MITE (2). In Arnold's Chron. ed. 1811, p. 204, it is expressly said that a mite is a Dutch coin, and that 'vij mytis makith an Eng. d.;' i. e. a mite is half a farthing; cf. Mark, xii. 42.

MIZEN. Palsgrave has: 'Meson sayle of a shyppe, mysayne.'

MIZZLE. 'To miselle, to mysille, pluuiare;' also 'a miselynge, nimbus;' Catholicon Anglicum, p. 241.

MOAT. The Romansch word muotta, a lower rounded hill, is interesting, as being still in very common use in the neighbourhood of Pontresina. It is the same word as F. motte.

MOIETY. Cf. Anglo-F. moyte, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 441; meite, id. i. 219.

MOLE (2). M. E. mollis, pl., Book of St. Albans, fol. f 6, back.

MONGREL. Spelt mengrell, Book of St. Albans, fol. f 4, back. This is still closer to A. S. meng-an.

MOONSHEE, a secretary. (Arab.) 'A writer, a secretary; applied by Europeans usually to teachers or interpreters of Persian and Hindustani;' H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 356. — Arab. munshi, a writer, secretary, tutor, language-master; Rich. Dict. p. 1508.

MOOR (3). The pl. Mowres occurs in Mandeville's Trav. p. 156.

MORASS. Heylin, at the end of his Observations on the Hist. of the Reign of King Charles, published by H. L., Esq. [i. e. Hamon Lestrangle], gives an Alphabetical Table containing the 'uncouth and unusual words which are found in our Author.' Among these is Morasse.

MORMONITE. Joseph Smith's own explanation was that Mormon = E. more + Egypt. mon, good; i. e. 'more good'! See The Mormons (London, 1851). — A. L. M. This explanation was probably an afterthought; in the first instance, the word was unmeaning.

MORRIS. To be marked as (Span., = L., = Gk.).

MORTUARY. Rather (F., = L.), than (L.). At any rate, we find Anglo-F. mortuarie, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 443.

MOSLEM. Arab. muslim, a righteous man; lit. a participial form, 4th conj., from salama, to be tranquil, at rest, to have done one's duty, to have paid up, to be at perfect peace. It implies 'one who strives after righteousness.' See Deutsch, Literary Remains, p. 129, for a full explanation of this great word. — A. L. M.

MOSQUITO. 'The Spaniards call them [the flies] Musketas;' E. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 275 (ab. 1583).

MOTET. This actually occurs as early as in Wyclif, English Works, ed. Matthew (E. E. T. S.), p. 91, l. 4 from bottom.

MOTH. The G. motte is not a true High-G. word, but merely borrowed from Low German. See Weigand; who also denies the connection between A. S. moððe and A. S. maðu. If there be no connection, we may still refer maðu to the Teut. base MA, to mow, as already said; cf. Fick, iii. 224. And perhaps A. S. moððe, also spelt mokða, may be allied to Skt. makshiká, a fly (by equating A. S. mok = mah- to Skt. mak).

MOULD (1), l. 9. The adj. mould-y is only related to mould, crumbling earth, when used with direct reference to such mould, which is very seldom the case. The word mouldy, as commonly used, is a different word altogether. See Mouldy (below).

MOULD (3), rust, spot. (E.) Perhaps only in the compound iron-mould. Here mould is a mere corruption of mole, a spot; the added d was prob. due to confusion with moled, i. e. spotted. 'One droppe of poyson infecteth the whole tunne of Wine; . . . one yron Mole defaceth the whole peece of Lawne;' Lyly, Enphues, ed. Arber, p. 39. See further under Mole (1).

MOULDY, musty, fusty. (Scand.) In Shak. 1 Hen. IV, ii. 4 134; iii. 2. 119. This is an extremely difficult word. It has probably been confused with mould (1), supposed to mean dirt, though it properly means only friable earth. It has also probably been confused with mould (3), rust, spot of rust. But with neither of these words has it anything to do. It is formed from the sb. mould, fustiness, which is quite an unoriginal word, as will appear. For an example of this sb., compare: 'we see that cloth and apparell, not aired, doe breed moathes and mould;' Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 343. This sb. is due to the M. E. verb moulen, to become mouldy, to putrefy or rot, as in: 'Let us not moulen thus in idlenesse;' Chaucer, C. T. Group B. l. 32. The pp. mouled was used in the precise sense of the mod. E. mouldy, and it is easy to see that the sb. was really due to this pp., and in its turn produced the adj. mouldy. Stratmann cites 'þi mouled mete,' i. e. thy mouldy meat, Political Poems, etc., ed. Furnivall, p. 181; mouldy bred, i. e. mouldy bread, Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 85; 'Pannes mouled in a wiche,' clothes lying mouldy in a chest; Test. of Love, b. ii., in Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561, fol. 296, col. 1. So also mowled, mowide, mucidus; from mowle, mucidare, Catholicon Anglicum, q. v. Todd cites: 'Sour wine, and mowled bread;' Abp. Cranmer, Ans. to Bp. Gardiner, p. 299. With which compare: 'Very coarse, hoary, moulded bread,' Knollys, Hist. of the Turks (Todd).

β. The oldest spelling of the M. E. verb is mwulen. 'Oðer leten þinges mwulen oðer rusten' = or let things grow mouldy or rusty; Ancrer Riwle, p. 344, l. 4. We also find 'mulede þinges' = mouldy things, id. p. 104, note h. — Icel. mygla, to grow musty. Formed, by vowel-change of u to y, from Icel. mugga, mugginess. See Muggy. Thus mould is mugginess; the notions of muggy and mouldy are still not far apart. Cf. also Swed. mögla, to grow mouldy, mögel, mouldiness or mould; möglig, mouldy. Der. mouldi-ness; also mould, verb, put for moul, Spenser, F. Q. ii. 3, 41. See note on Mould (1) above.

MOUTH. To the cognate forms add G. mund.

MULLET (2). Cf. molettys, pl., Book of St. Albans, pt. ii. (Of Arms) fol. b 3, back; molet, sing., id. fol. f 7, back. Anglo-F. molet, a mullet (in heraldry), A. D. 1399; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 181.

MUMMY. 'Take Momyan, oderwise called momyan among Poticaries;' Book of St. Albans, fol. c 3. This preserves the final n of Pers. mumáyin.

MUSCLE (2). The A. S. form muscule, apparently used as a plural, occurs very early, viz. in Ælfred, tr. of Bede, bk. i. c. i. 'Conchá, musclan, scille;' Mone, Quellen, p. 340.

MUSE (1). There are difficulties about this word. I give the solution proposed by Diez, which seems to me the best. Indeed, I find, that the word muse proves to have been in actual use as a term of the chase, precisely as I conjectured. 'And any hounde fynd or musyng of hir mace Ther as she hath byne,' i. e. if any hound find, or makes a scenting of her [the hare] where that she hath been; Book of St. Albans, fol. e 6. Here musyng = a sniffing, scenting. See musart, muse, musel, muser, in Bartsch (Chrestomathie Française).

MUTE (2). 'Yowre hawke mutessith or mutith;' Book of St. Albans, fol. a 6, back.

MUTTON. If we reject the Celtic origin, we may fall back upon the explanation given by Diez. The Celtic words may all have been borrowed from Low Latin, and they cannot be satisfactorily explained as Celtic. See Ducange, s. v. castrones, who has: 'oves, moltones, castrones, vel agnellos.' (A. L. Mayhew.)

MYSTERY (2). Cf. Anglo-F. mister, a trade, Langtoft's Chron. i. 124; Stat. of the Realm, i. 311, an. 1351.

NAG. Owing to the derivation from Du. negge, we actually find the spelling neg, in North's Life of Lord Guildford, ed. 1808, i. 272 (Davies).

NAKED. The verb nacian or ge-nacian occurs in the Old Northumbrian gloss of Mark, ii. 4, where Lat. nudauerunt is glossed by ge-nacedon.

NARD. Rather (F., = L., = Gk., = Heb., = Pers., = Skt.) The Gk. vapðós may have been borrowed from Heb. nerd, nard; the Heb. word being from the Persian, and that from the Skt.

NEAP. Cf. also Swed. knapp, scanty, scarce, narrow, sparing; knappa, to pinch, stint.

NEGRO. It is suggested that this is from Port. negro, black, not from Span. negro, black. It is surely very hard to decide, and cannot greatly matter. For my own part, I think Shakespeare and his contemporaries had it from Spanish.

NEPHEW. Cf. Anglo-F. nefu, Langtoft's Chron. i. 402; nevu, Vie de St. Auban, l. 1328.

NESH. The A. S. nom. is hnesce rather than hnesc. (T. N. Toller.)

NIGHTMARE. We also find Pol. mara, mora, nightmare, Bohem. míra, Russ. kiki-mora, phantom. Cf. also Skt. mára, death, killing, obstruction; from the same root.

NIGHTSHADE. The G. is nachtschatten, which Weigand compares with O. H. G. nahtscato, though the latter was only used in the sense of 'shadow of night.' The Du. is nachtschade, which Wedgwood inadvertently gives as the G. form. He probably means that one name for 'nightshade' in Swed. dialects is nattskate-gräs, which seems to be named from Swed. dial. nattskata, a bat; and that this last word is cognate with G. nachtschade, a night-jar, night-raven. This gives to nattskate-gräs the sense of 'night-jar-grass,' but does not at all explain E. nightshade, Du. nachtschade, G. nachtschatten, in which the second syllable is certainly 'shade.' It seems simpler to confess our ignorance of the reason for which this name was given.

NINEPINS. Ben Jonson speaks of 'nine-pins or keils,' Chlo-ridia, The Antimasque.

NIT. The A.S. nitian is also used in the sense to dash or strike, as in speaking of the collision of armed hosts; see Grein.

NITRE. Cf. Gk. νίτρον, soda; prob. from a Semitic source; cf. Heb. nether, Prov. xxv. 20, Jer. ii. 22; see Septuagint and Vulgate. —A. L. M.

NOCTURN. The Lat. nocturnus may also be divided as noct-ur-nus; cf. di-ur-nus. Roby divides it as noctur-nus, from noctus, by night, but enters it under the suffix -ur-no-. My division as noct-ur-nus = Gk. νυκ-τερ-νός, is that given by Vaniček.

NODDLE. The word knod, though not occurring in M. E., occurs in the Kentish nod, the nape of the neck (Kennet, 1695, E. D. S.); Sussex nod, the same. See Palmer, Folk-Etymology.

NONAGE. Orig. a law-term; Anglo-F. nonage, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 151.

NONCHALANT, careless. (F., —L.) Modern; not in Todd's Johnson. — F. nonchalant, 'careless,' Cot.; pres. pt. of O. F. nonchaloir, 'to neglect, or be careless of;' Cot. — F. non, not; chaloir, 'to care, take thought for;' id. Cf. O. F. chaloir, caloir, in Bartsch; also Anglo-F. nunchaler, to be careless, Life of Edw. Conf. 4519. — Lat. non, not; calere, to glow, be animated. See Caldron.

NOOSE. To be marked as (F., —L.). Certainly from O. F. nou, mod. F. nœud (Lat. nodus), a knot. The difficulty is to account for the final s. Perhaps = O. F. nous, preserved as a nom. case equivalent to Lat. nodus (cf. filis = filius); or perhaps = O. F. nous, nom. pl. Hardly from the adj. noeux, knotty.

NOSEGAY. The use of gay in the sense of a gay or showy object occurs in a quotation from N. Breton, ed. Grosart, given by Davies in his Supp. Glossary. Breton says: 'And though perhaps most commonly each youth is given in deede to follow euery gaye;' Toys of an Idle Head, p. 28.

NOZZLE. Cf. 'Ansa, nastle,' Wright's Voc. ii. 6 (11th cent.). This looks like the same word.

NUZZLE. So also Swed. nosa, to smell to, to snuff; nosa på all ting, to thrust one's nose into every corner (Wiedegren).

NULL. Perhaps (F., —L.) rather than L.; for it may have come in as a law-term. Cf. Anglo-F. nulle, Stat. of the Realm, i. 334. an. 1353; nul, Vie de St. Auban, l. 573. Cf. 'null and void.'

NUNCHEON. The statement that nuncheon was turned into the modern luncheon is needless, and unsupported. The words are quite distinct, as is rightly stated, s. v. Luncheon, at p. 345.

OAKUM. That the orig. sense of A. S. acumba was 'that which is combed away,' appears from the fact that it occurs as a gloss to L. putamen, i. e. that which is cut away; Mone, Quellen, p. 407.

OBIT. M. E. obite, A. D. 1447; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 285; Anglo-F. obit, A. D. 1381; id. p. 98.

OBSEQUIES. Anglo-F. obsequies, pl., Liber Customarum, p. 225.

OBSTACLE. For the suffix -culo, see Roby, 3rd ed. pt. I, § 862. 2 (c) 2. So also in Oracle, Receptacle.

ODALISQUE, a female slave in a Turkish harem. (F., —Turk.) 'Sleek odaliques;' Tennyson, Princess, ii. 63. — F. odalisque, the same (Littre); better spelt odalique (Devic). — Turk. odalik, a chambermaid. — Turk. oda, a chamber, a room; Zenker's Dict. p. 115.

OGLE. The verb to ogle is used by Dryden, Prol. to the Prophetess, l. 45; the sb. occurs in The Spectator, no. 46. 'The city neither like us nor our wit, They say their wives learn ogling in the pit;' T. Shadwell, Tegue o Dively, Epilogue, p. 80 (1691). A sidenote says: 'A foolish word among the canters for glancing.' It is thus one of the cant words introduced from Holland.

OMBRE. Mentioned in Wycherley, Plain Dealer, iv. 2 (1677).

ONE (1). Spelt won in 1536 by Sir W. Kyngston; and both won and woun by Hen. VIII. himself in 1544; see Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, ii. 59, 130. Spelt wone in Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 117 (1528). Roy even has wother for other; p. 60, l. 17.

ONION. Anglo-F. oynoun, Liber Albus, p. 238.

ONYX. The M. E. form oniche, occurring in Mandeville's Travels, p. 219, is taken from French. It is spelt onyche in Cotgrave.

OOZE. Cf. 'oes or mire;' E. Webbe, Travels (1590), ed. Arber, p. 32. The initial w is preserved in the Northants. weez or wooz, to ooze (Miss Baker). She gives an example of weez as a verb, to ooze out, answering to an A. S. *wésan formed from wós by vowel change of ó to é.

ORAL, l. 5. Instead of ✓AN, Vaniček refers us to ✓AS, to breathe, to be, whence also E. is. But see Fick, i. 486.

ORANGE. M. E. orange, Allit. Poems, ed. Morris, B. 1044; oronge, Prompt. Parv. (see Way's note). Cf. Skt. nāraṅga, an orange-tree.

ORANG-OUTANG. 'An oran-outang o'er his shoulders hung;' Garth, Dispensary, c. v. l. 150 (ab. 1696).

ORE. The etymology of A. S. ór is difficult, but it is probably only a variant of dr, copper, brass. Both the A. S. dr and Lat. as were used vaguely; Lewis and Short give, as the first sense of as, 'any crude metal dug out of the earth.' Fick ranges A. S. dr under the Teut. form AISA (iii. 5); and Lat. as under the Aryan form AYAS (i. 507). ¶ Wedgwood regards ore as a contraction of the Teut. word seen in G. ader, a vein; but the A. S. word for vein was édre, dér, a fem. sb., distinct from ór, ore, and óra, a coin (of a certain value); ór, like dr, was prob. neuter. Surely ór and édre are a long way apart, and I wholly dissent from such a notion.

ORGULOUS, proud. (F., —O. H. G.) The reading in modern editions for orgillous, Shak. Troil. prol. 2 Palsgrave has: 'Orguyllous, prowdre, orgueilleux.' M. E. orgeilus, O. E. Misc. p. 30, l. 23; cf. Sir T. Malory, Morte Arthure, bk. xxi. c. 1. Anglo-F. orguyllus, Langtoft's Chron. i. 54. — O. F. orguillus (11th cent.), later orgueilleux, 'proud,' Cot. — O. F. orguil, orguel, orgoil, mod. F. orgueil, 'pride,' id. [Cf. Span. orgullo, orig. urgullo, as shown by l. 1947 of the Poem of the Cid, Ital. orgoglio, pride.] From a supposed O. H. G. sb. *urguoli, pride; formed from O. H. G. urguol, remarkable, notable (Graff, iv. 153). See Diez, Scheler, Littre. Scheler further cites O. H. G. urgilo, proud (without a reference); Wackernagel has urgúl, an old boar, which is thought to be closely related. Cf. A. S. orgelice, arrogantly, in Ælfred, tr. of Boethius, c. 18, § 4. β. The O. H. G. word is compound; the prefix ur- answers to A. S. or-, Goth. us, out, and has an intensive force, as explained under Ordeal. γ. The latter part of the word is not clear; the vowel shews that it is hardly related to A. S. gál, luxury, or to G. geil, rank. It is rather to be connected with the E. verb to yell, A. S. geilan (pt. t. geall, pl. gullon, pp. gollen), in connection with which Fick cites O. Norse gollir, with resounding voice. See Fick, iii. 105; and see Yell. Cf. also G. gaul, a stallion, M. H. G. gúl, a boar, a word of obscure origin.

ORISON. I have received the following criticism. 'Treat -tio as -tor; there is no need of interposing the passive participle, which contributes nothing to the sense.' My reason for mentioning the passive participle is that it is better known than the supine, and for all practical purposes does just as well. I think there is certainly a need to mention the [form of the] passive participle, as it contributes something to the form. Thus Roby, in his Lat. Grammar, 3rd ed. pt. i. § 854, well explains the suffix -tion- as helping to form 'abstract feminine substantives formed from supine stems,' and instances accus-at-io (from accus-at-um, supine). This is precisely what I intend, and I am convinced that it is right.

ORLE, in heraldry, an ordinary like a fillet round the shield, within it, at some distance from the border; in architecture, a fillet. (F., —L.) F. orle, fem. 'a hem, selvidge, or narrow border; in blazon, an urle, or open border about, and within, a coat of arms;' Cot. — Low Lat. orla, a border, edge; in use A. D. 1244 (Ducange). This answers to a Lat. form *orula, not found, dimin. of ora, border, edge, margin.

ORRERY. 'And makes a universe an orrery;' Young, Night Thoughts, Night 9. The barony of Orrery derives its name from the people called Orbraighe, descendants of Orb; see Cormac's Glossary, ed. Stokes, 1868, p. 128. (A. L. Mayhew.)

OUCH, NOUCH. Cf. Anglo-F. nouche, Stat. of the Realm, i. 380, an. 1363; nusche, Vie de St. Auban, l. 20.

OUNCE (2). I find, in Cotgrave, lonce, 'the ounce, a ravenous beast;' also once, 'the spotted ounce, or lynx.' This gives early examples of the E. word, and shews that the F. had both lonce and once.

OUST. Anglo-F. ouster, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 113; Stat. of the Realm, i. 159, an. 1311.

OUTLINE. 'The painters, by the virtue of their outlines, colours, lights, and shadows,' &c.; Dryden, Parallel bet. Painting and Poetry, 1694 (repr. 1882, p. 139). This is the passage which Todd cites.

OWN (3). Add: Swed. unna, to grant, allow, admit.

OYER. Cf. Anglo-F. oier et terminer, to hear and determine, Stat. of the Realm, i. 44, an. 1276; Anglo-F. oyer, a hearing (verb infin. as sb.), Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 73.

OYEZ. Anglo-F. oyez, Stat. of the Realm, i. 211 (ab. A.D. 1286).⁴ See above. We even find the imp. sing. oyl used as an exclamation by a messenger in the Cov. Mysteries, p. 94.

OYSTER. Anglo-F. oyster, Liber Albus, p. 244.

PACK. Perhaps not (C.), but (L.). This can hardly be of ultimate Celtic origin, as the initial Aryan p is lost in the Old Celtic languages. In Teutonic, p is also extremely scarce as an initial letter. Hence, we are led to suppose that the word is really of Latin origin, although the Low Lat. paccus is not found early. The ✓PAK, to fasten, is, however, well represented in Latin, and it seems reasonable to refer the word to this root.

PAD (2). In Harman's Caveat, 1567, p. 84, we find hygh pad = highway. An example of pad in the same sense (in Ben Jonson) is given under Cant (1), p. 91 above.

PADDY, rice in the husk. (Malay. = Skt.) Malay. pādī, rice in the husk; the same as Karmāta (Canarese) bhatta, bhuttu, 'rice in the husk'; commonly called by Europeans in the S. of India batty, in the N. paddy, both derived apparently from this term, which again is derived from the Skt. bhaktā, properly, not raw, but boiled rice; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, pp. 79 and 386. = Skt. bhaktā, food, boiled rice; orig. pp. of bhaji, to divide, take, possess (Benfey).

PADLOCK. The word occurs much earlier. Florio (ed. 1598) translates Ital. loccetto by 'a padlocke, a little padlocke, such as we vse upon trap-doors.'

PAGEANT. In the Cov. Mysteries, p. 1, we find: 'In the fyrst pagent, we thenke to play How God dede make,' &c. Here the 'first pagent' is the first scene. The Lat. pagina occurs in the Gloss. to Liber Albus, iii. 470, where the editor suspects it to be wrong (though it is quite right), but afterwards compares it with the form pegma, of Gk. origin. An important example of M. E. pagyn (without the added f) occurs in Wyclif's Works, ed. Arnold, i. 129, l. 5; 'And þes pagyn playen þei' = and this pageant they play.

PAGODA. 'They have their idols . . . which they call Pagodes,' Hackluyt, Voyages, 1599, ii. 253. The allusion is to the people of Beejapoor, not far to the E. of the Portuguese settlement of Goa.

PALATE. We also find M. E. palase, the palate, Cath. Angl. p. 396, s. v. tunge. This is precisely F. palais.

PALFREY. With Low Lat. ueredus cf. W. gorwydd, a horse; Rhys, Celtic Britain, p. 295.

PALL (2), to become vapid. Not (C.), but (F., -L.). This account requires much correction; see note on Appal above. Palsgrave is right. Either pall is from O. F. pallir, pallir (F. pâlir), to grow wan or pale; or it is a shortened form of appal, which is from the same source with the mere addition of the prefix a- (Lat. ad).

PALLET (1). Anglo-F. paillete, straw, Bestiary, l. 451.

PALTRY. Cf. G. spalten, to split.

PAMPHLET. A curious instance of Low Lat. panfletus occurs: 'Revera libros non libras maluimus, codicesque plusquam flores, ac panfletos exiguos inaccessatiss prætulimus palfridis,' Rich. de Bury, Philobiblon, c. 8. The E. panflet occurs in the last paragraph of a Treatise on Fishing (1496).

PANNAGE, food of swine in woods; money paid for such food. (F., -L.) Obsolete; see Blount's Nomo-Lexicon, Todd's Johnson, &c. Also spelt pannage, and even pounage; see Chaucer, tr. of Boethius, ed. Morris, p. 180, l. 7. Anglo-F. panage, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 63, ii. 135. = O. F. pasnage, 'pawnee, mastage, monie . . . for feeding of swine with mast;' Cot. From a Low Lat. type *pastionaticum, pannage. Ducange gives the corrupted form pasnadum, and also the verb pastionare, to feed on mast, as swine. = Lat. pastio-, stem of pastio, a grazing, used in Low Lat. with the sense of right of pannage. = Lat. pastum, supine of pasce, to feed; see Pastor.

PANT. Cf. 'that made my heart so panck ever since,' as they say;' Dryden, Wild Gallant, Act v. sc. 3. A hawk was said 'to panke,' when short-winded; Book of St. Albans, fol. b6, back. We may perhaps compare pank with spank, q. v.

PANTALOON. Alban Butler (Lives of Saints) gives St. Pantaleon's death under the date July 27, A.D. 303. Sir H. Nicolas gives his day as July 28. Called in the Gk. church St. Pantelemon.

PANTHER. Not (F., -L., -Gk.), but (F., -L., -Gk., -Skt.). The Gk. πάθος was almost certainly borrowed from Skt. pundarika, a tiger; and then altered so as to give it an apparent Gk. form. The Skt. word is not given by Benfey with this meaning in his Dictionary, but he cites it elsewhere, and the word is well authenticated; see the St. Petersburg Skt. Dict., and Curtius, ii. 28.

PARADISE. It is now known that the Gk. παράδεισος is borrowed from the Zend or Old Persian pairidaēza, an enclosure, a place walled in. = O. Pers. pairi, around; and diz, to mould or form, cognate with Skt. dih. 'The root in Skt. is DIH or DHIH (for Skt. dh is Zend z), and means to knead, squeeze together, shape; whence also Skt. dehi, Gk. τοῖχος, a wall;' Max Müller, Selected Essays, 1881, i. 130. See also pairidaēza in Justi, Handbuch der Zendsprache. See ✓DHIGH, no. 168, at p. 736. If E. dike, as is probable, is cognate with Gk. τοῖχος, then paradise is (to coin a hybrid word) a 'peridike,' orig. an enclosure surrounded with a mud wall. See The Academy, Feb. 28, 1882, p. 140.

PARAMOUNT. The following are examples of Anglo-F. paramont. 'Et paramont la tombe,' and above the tomb; 'paramont les estalles,' above the choir-stalls; Will of Edw. Black Prince (1376); Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, pp. 67, 70. We also find it as an adv., spelt paramount, with the sense 'more'; Liber Albus, p. 390.

PARASITE. It should be noted that the invidious sense of the word is unoriginal. The word is of religious origin, and had reference to a class of priests who (probably) had their meals in common. See Liddell and Scott; also Plutarch, Solon, 24.

PARCH. Delete the first section. I have now no doubt that this word is (F., -L.), being merely a doublet of pierce. In the first place, we often find M. E. perchen, to pierce; of this I have already given two examples, to which add: 'A crown of thorn xal perchyn [shall pierce] myn brayn,' Coventry Mysteries, p. 238; also 'perche myne herte,' Religious Pieces, ed. Perry, E. E. T. S. p. 85, l. 65; and see perche, to thirle, in Cath. Angl. p. 276, note 4. Next, the change from perch to parch is perfectly regular and common; cf. dark from M. E. derk, sark from M. E. serk, parson from M. E. persone, &c. Lastly, the change of sense is due to the metaphor 'to pierce with cold,' of which 'to parch with heat' is the correlative. Cf. Cleveland peerching, piercing, said of cold or a cold wind (Atkinson); to perish (i. e. pierce) with cold, common in many dialects, from M. E. perishen, variant of percen, to pierce, as in P. Plowman, B. xvii. 189 (footnote). Cf. also Milton's lines: 'The parching air Burns froze,' P. L. ii. 594. Also 'Pearching, cold, penetrating, pinching;' R. B. Peacock, Lonsdale Glossary. 'It's a pearchin' cold wind, this!' W. Dickinson, Cumberland Glossary (E. D. S.). Parced (= pierced) occurs in Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 145. And observe that percher, to pierce, is the Walloon form of F. percer; see Sigart.

PARD. Cf. also Skt. pridāku, a leopard (Benfey).

PARIAH, an outcast. (Tamil.) Spelt paria in the story called The Indian Cottage, where it occurs frequently. From 'Tamil paraiyan, commonly, but corruptly, pariah, Malayālim parayan, a man of a low caste, performing the lowest menial services; one of his duties is to beat the village drum (called parai in Tamil), whence, no doubt, the generic appellation of the caste;' H. H. Wilson, Glossary of Indian Terms, p. 401.

PARLIAMENT. Anglo-F. parlement, Stat. of the Realm, i. 26, A.D. 1275. We find Lat. parlamentum in Matt. Paris, p. 696, under the date 1246, and parliamentum, in Matt. Westminster, p. 352, under the date 1253; see Stubbs, Select Charters, pt. vi.

PARSON. Cf. Selden's Table-Talk, s. v. Parson.

PARTAKE. 'We also find partetaker in Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 85 (A.D. 1528).

PARTICIPLE. M. E. participyl (15th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. ii. 14. PARTNER. Anglo-F. parcener, parsener, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 155; parcener, id. 45. See Coparcener above, p. 795.

PATE. Not (F., -G.), but (F., -G., -Gk.).

PATOIS. Occurs in Smollett, France and Italy, Letter xxi (Davies). Smollett gives a comic etymology from Lat. patavinitas (!), and accuses Livy of writing patois.

PAW. Not (C.), but prob. (F., -Low G.?). The W. and Corn. forms are, however, borrowed from English, and the Bret. form from O. French; see Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, p. 209. The E. word is, then, from O. F. poe, a paw, also found as pote (see above reference), which is the same word as Prov. pauta, a paw, Catalan pota (Diez, s. v. poe, p. 659). = Low G. pote, a paw; cf. Du. poot, G. pfote (from Low G.). These words seem to be further allied to Span. pata, a paw, F. patte; but the nature of the relationship is not clear. Weigand derives the G. words from the F. patte. Scheler supposes them to be from a common imitative root, seen also in Gk. παρεῖν; see Patrol, Path.

PAWNEE, drink; as in brandy-pawnee, Thackeray, Newcomes, ch. i. (Hind., = Skt.) Hind. pāni, water (also in Bengali, and other dialects); Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 397. = Skt. pānya (Wilson), allied to pāna, drinking, beverage (Benfey). = Skt. pā, to drink; cf. E. potation.

PAY (2). If we could find any early use of this word, I would rather derive it from French. There was an O. F. poier, to pitch, found in the 13th century; see Littré, s. v. poisser. The corresponding Norman (Anglo-F.) form would have been peier, whence E. pay would result; cf. Anglo-F. lei, law, fei, faith (F. loi, foi). The O. F. poier is from Lat. picare, just as before.

PAYNIM. Cf. Anglo-F. paenime, heathen lands; Life of Edw. Conf. l. 336.

PEA. The dat. pl. pisum occurs in the Old Northumb. gloss. of Luke, xv. 16.

PEA-JACKET, last line but one. Still, the W. pais can hardly be a related word. Prof. Rhys derives W. pais, formerly peis, from Lat. peza, i.e. peza uestis or peza tunica. The Lat. pezus, combed, having the nap on, is the pp. of pectere, to comb.

PEAL. 'Of the swete pele and melodye of bellis;' Monk of Evesham, c. lvii; ed. Arber.

PEAT. Gervase Markham calls the burning of weeds or furze to manure the ground a 'burning of Baite;' Farewell to Husbandry, 1649, p. 21.

PECK (2). Cf. Anglo-F. peck, a measure, Stat. of the Realm, i. 321, an. 1352; pek, Liber Albus, p. 335.

PEDIGREE. The spelling petit degree occurs in Stanyhurst, tr. of Æneid, ed. Arber, p. 14, l. 14; but this is probably a form of Stanyhurst's own, and proves nothing; for he also writes pettegrye, p. 30, l. 2.

PEEL (4), a small castle. (F.—L.) Used by Burns, The Five Carlins, st. 5; see Jamieson. M. E. pel (also pele, pell), Chaucer, Ho. of Fame, l. 1310 (iii. 220); peill, pl. pelis, Barbour, Bruce, 10. 137, 147. The same word as M. E. pile, P. Plowman, C. xxii. 366; cf. 'I dwelle in my pile of ston,' Torrent of Portugal, ed. Halliwell, 375; 'Grete pylis and castells;' Cov. Mysteries, p. 210. Latinised as pela, in a Charter, A. D. 1399 (Ducange). Merely another form of pile, in the sense of 'edifice,' as in Milton, P. L. i. 722; see remarks on Pile (1), below. Cf. W. pill, a shaft, stem, stock, stronghold, which is merely borrowed from E. (and F.) pile; Cotgrave has, among the meanings of pile, 'the bulke or body of a great tree.' The change of vowel, from i to e, is rare, but occurs in F. carène = Lat. carina; we have also pease, M. E. pease, from Lat. pisum.

PEEP (1). Cf. 'A pepe of chekynns (chickens);' Book of St. Albans, fol. f 7, l. 4.

PEEP (2). The particular expression day-pipe or peep of day is ingeniously explained with reference to the piping or matin-song of the birds in Palmer's Folk-Etymology. This is probably right, and furnishes another link between peep and pipe; cf. PEEP (1). But it does not so well explain Palsgrave's je pipe hors, of which I think I have suggested the right explanation. I may add that the passage in Palsgrave to which Wedgwood refers occurs at p. 804, col. 1 of the reprint, where we find: 'At daye pype, a la pipe du jour.' So also: 'by the pype of daye;' Life of Lord Grey, Camden Soc., p. 23.

PEG. See the account of Pilot below; we may connect peg with Dan. pegepind, a pointing-pin, from pege, to point, a verb which is prob. connected with pig, a point, and is certainly the same word as Swed. peka, to point.

PENNY-ROYAL. We find Lat. pulegium, O. F. puliol, in Wright's Voc. i. 139; and O. F. puliol real to translate Lat. origanum, id. 140 (as already noted).

PENTHOUSE. Anglo-F. pentiz, pl., Liber Albus, p. 271; spelt apentices, pl., id. 288.

PEREMPTORY. Anglo-F. peremptorie, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 245; peremptori, id. ii. 115.

PERENNIAL. Or we might explain Lat. perennis as 'lasting through the year.'

PERIWIG. 'Galerus, an hatte, a pirwike;' Cooper's Thesaurus (1565). 'The perwyke, la perruque;' De Wys, in app. to Palsgrave, repr. p. 902, col. 1 (ab. A. D. 1532).

PERIWINKLE (2). Halliwell gives prov. E. pennywinkle, a periwinkle, which is a fairly correct form, directly descended from A. S. pinewincla and Lat. pina. Cf. Gk. πύνα, πύνη, the pinna marina; also, a kind of mussel.

PERRY. M. E. pereye, Will. of Shoreham, ed. Wright, p. 8, l. 23. — O. F. peré, peiré, perey, perry (Roquefort); whence mod. F. poiré. This explains the E. form correctly, and at once.

PERUSE. I am confirmed in the etymology given by the use of this word in Fitzherbert's Book of Husbandry, first printed in 1523, so that he is a very early authority for it. He uses it just in the sense 'to use up,' or 'go through,' as if from per- and use. Thus a shepherd is instructed to examine all his sheep, 'and thus peruse them all tyll he haue done;' § 40, l. 23. The farmer is to number his sheaves, setting aside a tenth for tithes, 'and so to peruse from lande to lande, tyll he haue trefwely tythed all his come,' § 40, l. 7; &c. See my edition, p. xxix. As a good instance of a similar word take perstand, to understand, of which Davies says that it occurs several times in Peele's Clyomon and Clamydes. In Palmer's Folk-Etymology, an attempt is made to prove the existence of the apocryphal word to peruse by adducing the spelling perusing (sic), which really stands for perusing = perus-ing, and only furnishes an additional instance of peruse.

PETRIFY. Not (F.—L.—Gk.), but (F.—Gk. and L.).

PEW. Anglo-F. pui, a stage, platform, &c.; see Liber Custumarum, p. 216, and Glossary.

PHARISEE. Gk. φαρασαίο, Pharisees; from the Aramaic (not

PHEASANT. Anglo-F. fesaunt, Liber Custumarum, p. 304.

PTHISIC. 'Tysike, tisis; tisicus, qui patitur illam infirmitatem;' Cath. Angl. (1483).

PICE, a small copper coin in the E. Indies. (Maráthi.) From Maráthi paísá, a copper coin, of varying value; the Company's paísá is fixed at the weight of 100 grains, and is rated at 4 to the ana, or 64 to the rupee; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 389.

PICNIC. That the latter syllable is connected, as I supposed, with knick-knack, appears from the fact that nicknack was another name for a picnie. 'Janus. I am afraid I can't come to cards, but shall be sure to attend the repast. A nick-nack, I suppose? Cons. Yes, yes, we all contribute as usual; the substantials from Alderman Surloin's; Lord Frippery's cook finds fricassees and ragouts;' &c. Foote, The Nabob, Act 1. See Davies, Supp. Glossary.

PIDDLE, to trifle. (Scand.?) The sense 'to deal in trifles,' assigned to this verb at p. 441, is not justified. It means rather to trifle with a thing, as if picking at it with the fingers; Todd's Johnson gives one sense as 'to pick at table, to eat squeamishly,' with a quotation from Swift. Wedgwood observes that Skinner gives pittle as another form of the word; and we also find the variant pettle, to trifle (Halliwell). Thus dd is for tt, and we should take the form pittle as the older one, which exactly agrees with the Scand. form. — Swed. dial. pitla, to keep picking at, frequent. of Swed. peka, to pick (Rietz). Perhaps allied to Swed. dial. peka, to pick, and Swed. picka, E. pick. I do not now think it is connected with peddle.

PIKE. We find O. Northumb. horn-pic as a gloss. to pinnam (templi) in Luke, iv. 9. The Aryan initial p is lost in Celtic; but we may regard pike (and the numerous words allied to it) as being borrowed (through Celtic) from Latin, the initial s of spica being lost. The Wallachian pisc, Engadine piz, the peak of a mountain, may likewise be plausibly explained from Lat. spica. Compare SPIT (1).

PILE (1), a heap. At p. 443 I have inadvertently omitted to separate the senses of F. pile as given by Cotgrave. The senses 'ball, hand-ball,' are due to Lat. pila, a ball; but the senses 'pile, heap,' are due to Lat. pila, a pillar, a pier of stone. Thus pile (1) is the same as pile (2); the Lat. pila, a ball, being represented in English only by the dimin. pilula, E. pill. Under pile (2) there is also some confusion; the words require great care. Perhaps we may arrange them thus, for etymological purposes. Pile, a heap, stack; F. pile, from Lat. pila. Pile, a pillar, or rather edifice, as in Milton, P. L. i. 722; F. pile, Lat. pila, as before; doublet of peel, a castle; see PEEL (4) above. Also pile, in the phrase cross and pile; the same word; see p. 443. Pile, hair, nap; L. pilus. Also pile, a strong stake; A. S. pil, from L. pilum. Also pile, in heraldry, properly a sharpened stake, the same as the last.

PILLION. Not (C.), but (C.—L.). The Irish and Gael. peall are rather borrowed from than cognate with Lat. pellis.

PILORY. Wedgwood looks upon the Prov. espilori 'as furnishing the best clue to the origin of the word;' and thinks it may have originated in some such word as *expectaculorum, a place for exposing a criminal to public gaze. The idea is good, but the form suggested can hardly be the right one. I would suggest *speculorum, short for *speculatorium, a platform to look out from, a 'spy-place,' jocularly used.

PILOT. Wedgwood has here a very useful note. 'There is no doubt that the origin of the word is Du. peil-loot [now peil-lood, but loot is given in Hexham], a sounding-lead. The only question is as to the way in which the designation was transferred from the lead itself to the person who uses it. The probability appears to be that from the orig. peilloom was formed the O. F. verb piloter or pilotier, to take soundings (Cotgrave, Palsgrave), and thence pilote, the man who takes them. From F. I suppose that the word piloot (Kilian) or pilote (Biglotton) passed back into Dutch, where it will be seen that the connection with peilen or pijlen, to take soundings, has become obscured by the passage of the word through a foreign tongue.' He then observes that sect. 6 in my Dictionary is wrong, which is the case. Hexham gives peylen, pijlen, to sound the depth (sic) of water; and I have unluckily taken pijlen as the truer form. On the contrary, peylen (mod. Du. peilen, G. peilen) is the right form, and is a mere contraction of O. Du. pegelen, to measure the concavity or the capacity of anything; Hexham. — O. Du. (and Du.) pegel, the capacity of a vessel, gauge. This word is rather of Danish than of Du. origin, being the Dan. pægel, a half-pint measure; it is due to the Danish custom of marking off the inside of a drinking-vessel by pegs, pins, or knobs, as explained by Molbech, s. v. pægel. Cf. Dan. pege, to point, pegefinger, the fore-finger (pointer), pegepind, a pointing pin or fescue; whence the Dan. pægel (as if 'little pointer') was prob. derived. These words exhibit the usual Danish weakening of k to g, since they are the same as Swed. peka, to point, pek-finger, fore-finger, pek-pinne, pointing pin. Prob. allied to Dan. pig, Swed. pik, a pike; see also note on Peg (p. 821). I conclude that Diez is right in supposing that the Du. piloot, a pilot, was borrowed from French, being formed from F. piloter, to sound. But it is also true that F. piloter was, in its turn, borrowed from O. Du. peyl-loot (now peil-loot), a sounding-lead; compounded of peylen, short for pegelen, to gauge (from pegel, a little peg), and loot, cognate with E. lead. Thus to pilot is really 'to gauge depths by a lead, as one gauges depths in a tankard by a little peg.'

PINCH. Dante has picchia, Purg. x. 120 (but some read nicchia). (A. L. M.) Florio gives only picciare in the sense to pinch; but both picciare and picchiare in the sense 'to knock at a door.'

PINCHBECK. The place in Lincolnshire is spelt Pyncebek in the Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 127.

PINE-APPLE. We actually find the pine-tree called 'pinaple-tre;' see Du Wys, in app. to reprint of Palsgrave, p. 915, col. 1 (ab. 1532).

PINK (1). Not (C.), but perhaps (C., -L.). This word presents much difficulty. My view is that these apparently Celtic words (see sect. β) are all due to Lat. spica, which I take to be also the origin of pike, peak, &c., pike being merely a shortened form of spike. See note on Pike above. As to sect. γ of this article, it is certain that A. S. pyngan is from Lat. pungere; but pink cannot be from A. S. pyngan.

PIPPIN. The probability that a pippin is an apple raised from a pipin or pip is borne out by the following. 'To plante trees of greynes and pepins;' Arnold's Chron., 1502, ed. 1811, p. 167.

PIROUETTE. Cf. Walloon berweter, to pirouette, to roll over and over (Sigart).

PISTACHIO. Also fistiq, fistug; Rich. Dict. p. 1090, where it is cited as an Arabic word; but the word is Persian, from Pers. pistak, the pistachio-nut; Rich. Dict. p. 332.

PIT. The pit of a theatre was formerly called the cock-pit; see Nares. Cf. Shak. Hen. V. prol. 11. Dryden uses pit repeatedly, as e.g. in Epilogue to All for Love, l. 3.

PLAGUE. Caxton has plaghe as a verb, tr. of Reynard, c. 28; ed. Arber, p. 70, l. 9.

PLAINTAIN. To be marked as (F., -L.).

PLANK. Cf. Walloon planke, a plank (Sigart).

PLASTER. Cf. M. E. emplaster, sb., Reliq. Antiquæ, i. 54; emplastur, Monk of Evesham, ed. Arber, last page; emplasters, pl., id. p. 22. This shows the full form; cf. censer for encenser, print for imprint or emprint.

PLATE. This even appears in A. S., borrowed from Low Latin. 'Obrizum, platum, smæte gold;' Mone, Quellen, p. 403.

PLATEAU. This word occurs (perhaps for the first time in E.) in a description of the Battle of Eylau in the Annual Register, 1807, p. 11, col. 2, where we read of 'a rising ground or flattish hill, which, in the military phraseology of the French, is called a plateau.'

PLAYHOUSE. The existence of this word even in A. S. is remarkable. 'Caestis theatri, þæs heofonlican pleghuses;' Mone, Quellen, p. 366.

PLIGHT (3), condition, state. (F., -L.). It is quite certain that plight, in the sense of condition, or state, is a separate word from plight in the sense of danger or engagement. This is pointed out by Wedgwood, who remarks that plight, condition, should have been spelt plite. As a fact, such is the M. E. form, as already noticed in the instance from Chaucer, C. T. 16420 (see Six-text, Group G, l. 952); so also in Chaucer, C. T. 10209 (Six-text, E. 2335). - O. F. plite, occurring in Littleton's Tenures, foll. 69 and 83 back (ed. 1612), where it is spelt plyte; also spelt plyte, pliste in Roquefort, who explains it by 'condition, state.' A fem. form answering to O. F. ploi, situation, plight; of which three examples are given by Lacune de Sainte Palaye; Wedgwood gives plait in the same sense, from the Fabliau of the Miller and Clerks in Wright's Anecdota Literaria, p. 22. This O. F. ploi is the same as F. pli, 'a plait, fold, also a habit,' Cot.; and corresponds, accordingly, to E. Plait, q. v.; and also to Plight (2), q. v. Thus O. F. ploi, F. pli, is from Lat. plicatum, or rather plicitum; whilst O. F. plite or pliste = Lat. plicita; both from Lat. plicare, to fold. ¶ I must here add that Wedgwood derives plight, in the sense of 'engagement,' from O. F. plaid, Lat. placitum, from which I entirely dissent, preferring to derive plight (1) from A. S. pliht, peril, hence forfeit, engagement. [The O. F. plaid is, in fact, E. plea; see Plea.] It is clearly the A. S. pliht (not O. F. plaid), which is related to such words as Swed. bepligta, to bind by oath, forplikta, to oblige, engage, Du. verpligten, to oblige, bind, Du. Dan. and Swed. pligt, duty, obligation, &c. See Plight (1) at p. 450.

PLOT (1). 'Now to confirm the complot thou hast cast;' Span. Tragedy (ab. 1594); in Hazlitt's Old Plays, v. 74. This shows complot in use before 1600.

PLUMAGE. M. E. plumage, Book of St. Albans, fol. a 7, back.

PLUNDER. A slightly earlier example occurs in Bp. Hall's Episcopacie by Divine Right, 1640, § 1, p. 3: 'the feare of plundering a faire temporall estate by the furious multitude.'

PLUNGE. Cf. Anglo-F. se plunge, plunges, Bestiary, l. 832.

POLECAT. Probably (F., -L.). I now believe the suggestion, that it means a cat that goes after poultry, to be the right one. Chaucer, speaking of the 'polcat,' says that it slays capons; C. T. 12789. The difficulty as to the difference of vowel between the o in polcat and the ou in F. poule, can be accounted for. On the one hand, the E. word also appears as pulcatte in the Book of St. Albans, fol. f 4, back; and, in the Prompt. Parv., though the word is printed polkat, Way notes that the MS. has pulkat. In Shak. Merry Wives, iv. 1. 29, the first folio has powlkats, and there is a play upon the word, Quickly mistaking it for Lat. pulcher. Even Gay (according to Palmer's Folk-Etymology) has the spelling poulcats. On the other hand, the French poule must once have taken the form pole, or polle, though the only traces of this I have yet found are these, viz. (1) polle, a virgin, occurring in the Cantilène de Sainte Eulalie, l. 10, which is the same word, as it represents the Lat. pulla; (2) the spellings pol-ain, pol-age in Roquefort, for poulain, poulage; and (3) O. F. pol-ette for poul-ette, in Littré. Add to these the Prov. polla, Span. polla, Ital. polla (in Florio); and I think we see sufficient reason for explaining pole-cat as 'poule' cat. It is very remarkable that we never say pooltry but pole-try, for poultry; see also the Anglo-F. forms given under Poult, below. ¶ I observe that the new edition of Ogilvie's Dict. suggests poult-cat; surely poule-cat is much more exact. Cf. Puttock.

POLICY. The etymology given is that offered by Diez in the earlier editions of his work; in the 4th edition he suggests a derivation from pollex, which Scheler (in a note at p. 727) thinks less likely.

POLL. To be marked as (O. Low G., -C.?).

POLLUTE. The pp. pollutyd occurs in the Cov. Mysteries, p. 154.

POLONY. For Bolony; this spelling of Bologna occurs in Webb's Travels, 1590, ed. Arber, p. 30. See Cotgrave, s. v. saucisse.

POOL (1). Not (C.), but (C., -L.). The O. W. form is pull, not a Celtic word, but borrowed from Late Lat. padulem, acc. of padulis, whence also Ital. padule, Port. paul, a marsh, piece of marshy ground. This late Lat. padulis is obviously a corrupt form, put for paludis, from paludi, crude form of Lat. palus, a swamp, marsh, fen, pool. See W. Stokes, Cornish Glossary, in Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, p. 212, and Diez, s. v. padule, 4th ed. p. 388. Vaniček suggests that pal-us is a compound word; the former part may be compared with Skt. palvala, a pool, palala, mire, mud, and Gk. πηλός, mud; whilst the base -ūd- may be connected with Lat. und-a and E. water.

POOR. I have already said that I understand the M. E. poure to stand for povre. We actually find 'The pouer and nedy;' Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 76 (A. D. 1528).

POPINJAY. Anglo-F. papejays, pl., parrots, occurs in 1355; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 35.

POPLIN. See an excellent suggestion in N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 305, that poplin may have been named from Popering, mentioned in Chaucer's Rime of Sir Thopas; as to which Tyrwhitt says that 'Popering or Poppeling, was the name of a parish in the Marches of Calais; our famous antiquary Leland was once rector of it; see Tanner, Bib. Brit. in v. Leland.' Poperin pears were famous; see Nares. Also called Poperingen, Poperingne. It was famous for manufactures 'de draps, de serges, et autres étoffes;' Le Grand Dict. Géographique, par M. Bruzen La Martinière, La Haye, 1736. It is near Ypres, in W. Flanders. As to the spelling papelme, we find a similar exchange of vowels in O. Du. pappel-boom, also popelier-boom, a poplar (Hexham).

PORE (2). See note to Pour, below.

PORRIDGE. Not (F., -L.), but (F., -C., -L.). I have now no doubt that Wedgwood is right in considering this as merely another form of pottage, which first became poddige (still preserved in the Craven word poddish, see Halliwell), and afterwards porrige or porridge. Hence Cotgrave gives potage, 'pottage, porridge;' cf. the Southern E. errish, stubble, put for eddish, A. S. edise. I know of no example of porridge earlier than Skakespeare, who prob. introduces it as a dialectal form; he uses porridge eight times, but pottage not at all. A confusion with M. E. porree, a kind of pottage (but properly containing pot-herbs) may easily have helped this change of form. β. I may observe that the derivation of porridge from O. F. porée is given in Todd's Johnson and in Richardson; Mahn (in Webster) hesitates between this solution and the possibility of a corruption from pottage. The question is decided by the etymology of porringer, for which see below. γ. I must also note that F. porrée and F. purée are different words; porrée = Low Lat. porrecta, from porrum; but purée, says Brachet, is for peurée = peurée, Lat. pipérata.

PÖRRINGER, a small dish for porridge. Not (F., = L.; with E. suffix), but (F., = C., = L.; with E. suffix). Porringer and porridge are corruptions from pottanger (at first pottanger) and pottage. This is ascertained by the old form pottanger in Palsgrave, who gives: 'Pottanger, escuelle, avrillon'; and again, Baret (1580) has: 'Potenger, or little dish with eares.' Halliwell notes that pottanger is still in use in Devon. The intrusive n (before the soft g) is precisely the same as in messenger, passenger, scavenger. We actually find 'poregers of pewter'; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 115 (1522).

POSE (1), section 3. The true derivatives of Lat. ponere appear not only in the sbs. such as position, but also in the verbs compound, expound, propound, and the adjectives ponent, component, &c.

POSE (3), a cold in the head. For (E.?), read (C.). The word is certainly Celtic, from W. pas, a cough; cf. Corn. pas, Bret. paz, a cough, Irish casachdas, a cough, Skt. kās, to cough, Lithuan. kosti, to cough. — ✓ KAS, to cough; see note upon A. S. hwōstan at the end of the article on Whoeze. (Suggested by A. L. Mayhew.)

POT. Not (C.), but (C., = L.). The Irish potaim, I drink, Gael. poit, is not cognate with, but borrowed from Lat. potare. The genuine O. Irish derivative from ✓ PA appears as ibim, I drink, in which the initial p is dropped; see Fick, iv. 159.

POTASH. Mentioned as early as 1502. 'Xij. ll. pot-asshes;' Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 187.

POTATION. Spelt potacion, Cov. Myst. p. 138.

POULT. The M. E. pultier (our poultier-er) answers to Anglo-F. poleter, pulleter; see Stat. of the Realm, i. 351; Liber Albus, p. 465. Poultry answers to Anglo-F. poletrie, pultrie, Lib. Albus, p. 231.

POUNCE (1). The claws on the three front toes of a hawk's foot were called pounces; Book of St. Albans, fol. a. 8. See note on Talon, below.

PRECINCT. Spelt precincte, Will. of Hen. VI.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 298; precinct, id. p. 299.

PREFER. Spelt preferre in Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 30; ed. Arber, p. 78, l. 28.

PREMISES. An excellent example of the old use of the word occurs in the Will of Lady Margaret (1508). 'All which maners, londs, and tenements, and other the premisses, we late purchased,' &c.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 378. There are numerous similar examples in Caxton's print of the Statutes of Hen. VII.

PRETTY. We can trace the W. prait still further back. Spurrell explains W. prait by 'practice,' as well as 'act or deed,' and Prof. Rhys points out that W. -ith = Lat. -et, as in W. rhaith = Lat. rectum, &c.; see his Lectures on Welsh Philology, p. 64. Hence W. prait answers to, and was prob. borrowed from, Low Lat. practica, execution, accomplishment, performance. And this Lat. word is, of course, merely borrowed from Greek; see further under Practice. It is clear that the same Low L. practica will also account for Icel. pretr, a trick, piece of roguery, which answers to it both in form and sense; for practica also meant 'trickery,' like the E. practice in Elizabethan writers.—A. L. M. The suffix -y in pretty is, accordingly, English; but the A. S. prætt may have been borrowed from British, which in its turn was borrowed from Latin, and ultimately from Gk. Thus the word may (probably) be marked as (L., = Gk.; with E. suffix.). The Icel. pretr may have been borrowed from English.

PRICKLE. 'Stimulus, pricelsum'; Mone, Quellen, p. 417.

PRIG (1), to steal. (E.) This is a cant term of some antiquity; prig, sb., a thief, occurs in Shak. Wint. Ta. iv. 3. 108. It arose in the time of Elizabeth, and is merely a cant modification of E. prick, which orig. meant to ride, as in Spenser, F. Q. i. 1. 1, P. Plowman, B. xviii. 11, 25. Hence it came to mean to ride off, to steal a horse, and so, generally, to steal. This we learn from Harman's Caveat, 1567, where we find: 'to prygge, to ryde,' p. 84, col. 3; and at p. 42: 'a prigger of prauuncers be horse-stealers: for to prigge signifieth in their language to steale, and a prauuncer is a horse.' Again, at p. 43, he tells how a gentleman espied a pryggar, and charged 'this prity prigging person to walke his horse well' for him; whereupon 'this pelytynge priggar, proude of his praye, walkethe his horse vp and downe tyll he sawe the Gentleman out of sighte, and leapes him into the saddell, and awaye he goeth a-mayne.' That is how it was done. We find a similar weakening of k to g in Lowl. Sc. prigga-trout, a banstickle, or stickleback (evidently for pricker-trout), and in Lowl. Sc. prigmedainty, the same as prickmedainty, one who dresses in a finical manner (or as we now say, a prig). Gawain Douglas, Prol. to Virgil, bk. viii. st. 8, already has: 'Sum prig penny,' which is thought to mean 'some haggle for a penny,' though the passage is obscure. Halliwell also gives prygman, a thief, which occurs in Awdelay's Fraternyte of Vacabondes, ed. Furnivall, p. 3; and prig, to ryde, in Dekker's Lanthorne, sig. C. ii. So also trigger stands for tricker.

PRIG (2), a pert, pragmatical fellow. (E.) 'A cane is part of the dress of a prig;' Tatler, no. 77 (1709). From the verb to prick, in the sense to trim, adorn, dress up; Latimer (Works, i. 253, Parker Soc.) speaks of women having 'much pricking,' and inveighs against their 'pricking up of themselves.' Cf. Lowl. Sc. prig-me-dainty for prick-me-dainty, a prig, which occurs in Udall, Roister Doister, ii. 3, ed. Arber, p. 36. See Prig (1).

PRIME (1). Primacy answers to Anglo-F. primacie, Polit. Songs, p. 311; primacye, Langtoft's Chron. i. 170.

PRIMROSE. I should have added the O. F. form primerole, a primrose; it occurs in Le Roman de la Rose, l. 8264, and, according to Littre, is still in use. Dr. Prior invents the form primeverole, which it will puzzle any one to find, and is certainly wrong. Florio has primula as an Ital. form, as well as primavera. The curious spelling primarose occurs in the Book of St. Albans, fol. b. 7, and pt. ii. fol. b. 3, back.

PRINT. See note upon Imprint, above. It is best to take imprint (or rather M. E. emprenten) as the source of print, verb. No doubt print, sb., arose in the same way.

PROGENITOR. Spelt progenytour, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 91, l. 25; progenitour, Cov. Myst. p. 67.

PROPENSE. Anglo-F. purpense, Laws of Will. I. § 2.

PROSODY. Spelt prosodye, Cov. Mysteries, p. 189.

PROSTHETIC, prefixed. (Gk.) Modern; as if for Gk. πρόθετικός, lit. disposed to add, giving additional power; allied to Gk. πρόθερος, added, put to; cf. πρόθεσις, a putting to, attaching. — Gk. πρός, to; θε-ρός, placed, put, verbal adj. from the base θε-, to place; see Theme. Cf. Gk. ἐπι-θετικός = Lat. adiectivus.

PROXY. Anglo-F. procuracie, Liber Albus, p. 423.

PTARMIGAN. The word was actually once spelt termagant. 'Heath-cocks, capercaillies and termagants;' Taylor the Water Poet (1618), ed. Hindley; cited in Palmer's Folk-Etymology, p. 386.

PUDDLE (1). The Welsh is puwel, not in the dictionaries; whence pudlog, adj., full of puddles (D. Silvan Evans). Stratmann has both podel and plod, and it seems best to take podel as standing for *plodel, dimin. of plod, a pool. — Irish and Gael. plod, a pool, standing water. The root is uncertain and it may have been, originally, not a Celtic word. It reminds us of Lat. acc. paludem.

PUISSANT. The sb. puissance was used by Richard, Duke of York, in 1452; see Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 11.

PUNCH (2). A very clear example is in the Cov. Myst. p. 75. 'Punchyth me, Lorde,' i. e. punish me, Lord.

PUNCH (3). Mr. Yates Thompson sends me a very curious instance of the occurrence of this word. He writes: Monsieur de la Boullaye-le-Gouz, in his Travels (Paris, 1652) defines Bolleponge [his spelling of E. bowl of punch] as follows. 'Bolleponge est un mot Anglois, qui signifie un boisson dont les Anglois usent aux Indes, faite de sucre, suc de limon, eau de vie, fleur de muscade, et biscuit rosty.' The ingredients are here five in number. The traveller was in India in 1649. 'Palapuntz, an Indian drink,' &c.; Coles, ed. 1684.

PUNY. Anglo-F. pune, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 83; spelt puisne, id. iii. 317.

PUPPY (1). 'Smale ladies popis;' Book of St. Albans, fol. f. 4, back.

PURSE. Anglo-F. burse, Life of Edw. Conf. l. 929. The E. purser occurs in the York Mysteries, p. 225, l. 136.

PURLAIN, l. 5. After 'Prompt. Parv., p. 417,' insert: — F. porcelaine, pourcelaine, 'the herb purslane;' Cot.

PURSUE. Anglo-F. persuer (error for pursuer), Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 27; pursuer, F. Chron. of London (Camd. Soc.), p. 76. The O. F. suir (F. suiure) is from Low Lat. sequere, substituted for Lat. sequi.

PURTENANCE. Anglo-F. apurtenance, Langtoft's Chron. i. 438; aportenance, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 69.

PURVEY. Anglo-F. purveier, to provide, Liber Customarum, p. 216; purveer, Stat. of the Realm, i. 192, an. 1323. Note also Anglo-F. purveance, purveyance, Polit. Songs, p. 231; purveour, a purveyor, Stat. of the Realm, i. 137, an. 1300.

PURVIEW, a proviso or enactment. (F., = L.) Now applied to the enacting part of a statute as opposed to the preamble, and so called because it formerly began with the words purveu est, it is provided. Spelt purvieu in Blount. — Anglo-F. purveu = O. F. pourveu, provided, Cotgrave; mod. F. pourvu. Pp. of O. F. porvoir, F. pourvoir; see Purvey.

PUTTOCK. Spelt puttocke, Book of St. Albans, fol. b. 2.

PYRAMID. Palmer's Folk-Etymology contains the following: 'The word is no doubt of Egyptian origin, probably from pi-ram, "the lofty," from ram, aram, to be high (S. Birch, in Bunsen's Egypt, vol. v. p. 763). Brugsch says that in Egyptian pir-am-us is "edge of the pyramid," and abumir, "a pyramid" (Egypt under the Pharaohs, vol. i. p. 73). These accounts do not agree; perhaps both are false.

QUAFF. I regard the final -t in Palsgrave's quaught as due to a sb. quaught, a draught, in which the -t is suffixed, as in draught from draw, laugh-ter from laugh; cf. also hois-t, waf-t, graf-t. G. Douglas has waucht, to quaff (see Jamieson), but Dunbar has the simple form, as in: 'They waucht at the wicht wyne,' they quaffed at the strong wine; Maitland Poems, p. 46. This is decisive as to the later addition of t. Cf. 'The quaff, or cup, is filled to the brim;' Hone, Tablebook, i. 467.

QUAINT. Cf. Anglo-F. quaintement, quaintly, Langtoft's Chron. i. 258.

QUARREL (1). Spelt quarel; Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 37; ed. Arber, p. 103, l. 7.

QUARRY (2), a heap of slaughtered game. (F., -L.) The account of F. curée given in Littré shews decisively that the explanation given under this word is wrong. The point is one of difficulty, and turns on the fact that the O. F. curée and coree, given by Burguy as variants of the same word, are really quite different words. I have correctly given the etymology of O. F. coree, formed from Lat. cor, the heart; unfortunately, this is not the E. word. β. The O. F. curée appears, in its oldest form, as cuiree, and this form is given by Roquefort with a correct derivation. He explains cuiree as meaning 'la curée des chiens de chasse, de corium.' Now it is precisely this O. F. cuiree which explains our word; it was naturally written as querre (dissyllabic) in Middle English, as in the quotation already cited; and afterwards became quarry, precisely as we have clerk for clerk, dark for M. E. derk, &c., &c. Littré gives a long quotation from Modus, fol. 23 back (of the 14th century), shewing that the quarry, as given to the dogs, was prepared and given to them in the skin of the slain animal. This is confirmed by the allusions to the querre or quyrre in The Book of St. Albans, fol. f. 3, back, and fol. f. 4, where we are told that it 'callid is, I-wis, The quyrre, aboue the skyn for it etyn is.' Hence O. F. cuiree is formed (with suffix -ee = L. -ata) from cuir, skin, hide. = L. corium, hide, skin. See Cuirass. Scheler accepts this explanation as decisive; the old etymology, as given in Brachet, must be set aside. Moreover, the above etymology is confirmed by the use of the word in the Venerie de Twety, pr. in Reliq. Antiq. i. 153, where we find: 'the houndes shal be rewardid with the nekke and with the bewellis, with the fee, and thei shal be etyn undir the skyn, and therefore it is clepid the quorre.'

QUASH. Anglo-F. quasser, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 111.

QUAY. Anglo-F. kaie, kaye, key; Gloss. to Liber Albus. With the W. cae cf. Irish cae, a hedge, O. Irish cai, a house (Cormac's Glossary). 'The root is K1 (Skt. çf), whence κώρη, κώμη, Lat. quies, Goth. haims, E. home;' Whitley Stokes, in Phil. Soc. Trans. 1869, p. 254.

QUICKSAND. 'Aurippus, cwece-sand,' lit. quake-sand, Wright's Vocab. ii. 8 (11th cent.). It has been shewn that quake and quick are closely related; and see Quagmire.

QUICKSILVER. 'Argentum uiuum, cwicce-solfor;' Wright's Vocab. ii. 8 (11th cent.).

QUILT. Anglo-F. quille, quilt of a bed, occurs in the Black Prince's Will (1376); Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 74.

QUINCE. In Wright's Vocab. i. 163, we find F. coigner, glossed by a coyn-tre or a quince-tre; at p. 181, we find quyns-tre; and at p. 192, a quoyne-tre. When we compare these with quyne-able-tre in Palsgrave, it becomes clear that quince or quins is merely the plural of quyne or quin; and that quince-tree is a tree bearing quins. Again quin, quoyne, or coin is from O. F. coin, a quince, as already said. For -ce as a pl. suffix, cf. mice, pence, lice, dice.

QUINQUAGESIMA. I. 1. For 'second' read 'next.'

QUINSY. M. E. squincanie, spelt squnyansy (14th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. i. 51. The prefixed s may be regarded as due to O. F. es- = Lat. ex, used as an intensive prefix. Hence the F. form esquinance in Cotgrave.

RACK (1). Early examples of the sb. occur in: 'a peyre rakkes of yryne;' Earliest E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 56, l. 27; 'rakkes and brandermes of erne' [iron]; id. p. 57, l. 27; A. D. 1424. Also: 'a rake of yren,' described as used for roasting eggs on; id. p. 102, l. 5; A. D. 1434. I strongly suspect the word was borrowed from the Netherlands. Cf. O. Du. recke, a perch, or a long pole; een reck der vogelen, a hen-roost; recken, to rack; reck-banch, 'a racke, or a torture-bank;' Hexham.

RACK (3). The latter part of the definition 'to subject it to a fermenting process' is prob. wrong; I forget whence it was copied (as I believe it was). Bacon, Nat. Hist. § 305, says: 'it is in common practice to draw wine or beere from the lees, which we call racking, whereby it will clarify much the sooner;' cf. also § 306. Wedgwood quotes Languedoc araca le bi, transvaser le vin, which he derives from draco or raco, dregs, in the same language. Whether draco and raco are connected words I do not know; but we may similarly derive F. raquer, in Cotgrave, from raque, dirt, mud, mire, in the same; raque may have been taken in the sense of 'dregs,' Cotgrave also gives rasque, 'the scurf of a scald head;' cf. mod. F. rasche, scurf (Littré). It seems to me to make little difference to the etymology. The F. raquer meant 'to clear from dregs,' from the sb. raque, dirt. I take the orig. sense of raque or rasque to have been 'scrapings,' rache being another form of the same word. Littré connects rache with Prov., Span., Port. rascar, to scrape; see further under Raséal.

RAID. Lord Dacre, who made many a raid into Scotland, calls it 'a rode;' Orig. Letters, ed. Ellis, i. 249. Wyntown speaks of a Sir Andrew, who 'made syndry radis in England;' viii. 34. 34. (Jamieson.)

RAIL (2), to use reviling language. Littré cites from Ducange O. F. rasgler, to rail, which he regards as derived from Lat. ras-um, supine of radere; and he considers this as confirming the supposed equation of F. railler to Lat. *radulare, from the same source. Wedgwood connects F. railler with Du. ralen, to prate, ratelen, to rattle; but it is shown, under Rail (3), that the F. verb hence derived is rdler, O. F. raller, and I doubt if F. railler and rdler can be thus equated. See Scheler.

RAIL (3). Spelt raale, Book of St. Albans, fol. f. 7, back. This agrees better with the F. form.

RAISE. I. 5. By 'the simple verb,' I mean the form answering to E. rise; i. e. there is no Swed. risa, nor Dan. rise.

* RAJPOOT, a prince. (Hind., -Skt.) Hind. rajput, a prince, lit. the son of a rajah; Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 434. -Skt. rája, a king; putra, a son; so that the lit. sense is 'son of a king.'

RANK (1). Anglo-F. renc, a ring of people, Life of Edw. Conf. l. 3363; renes, ranks, id. 1923. Here we find final c for g, as in tank and stank.

RANKLE. Perhaps (F., -L.) rather than (E.). We find the sb. rancle, a festering sore, in the 14th cent.; see Reliq. Antiquæ, i. 52, 53. Also rancle, verb, as in: 'maake the legges to rancle;' Book of St. Albans, fol. a. 3, back. The sb. corresponds to Anglo-F. rancle, a sore, in the Life of Edw. Conf. 2677; we also find the pp. francles, festered, and the pp. arancle, putrified, in the same, ll. 4166, 2615. These are forms of the 12th century. These words are to be connected with F. rance, putrified, rather than with E. rank, coarse in growth; and F. rance is from Lat. acc. rancidum; see Rancid. The confusion between E. rank and F. rance has already been pointed out; see Rank (2).

RAP (2). Rap and rend occurs in Roy, Rede Me, ed. Arber, p. 74.

RAPE (1). 'Murdre, rape, and treson;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 33, ed. Arber, p. 95.

RAPE (3). In the sense of 'division of a county,' it occurs in Arnold's Chron., (about 1502), ed. 1811, p. 181.

RAPT. 'Here y felte my-selfe fyrst rapte in spyryte;' Monk of Evesham, ed. Arber, c. xiii., p. 33. 'He was rapte,' id. c. vi., p. 26.

RASCAL. Cf. Anglo-F. rascaille, a host, a rabble, Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 293; raskayle, Langtoft's Chron. i. 136; raskaylle, id. ii. 296. The O. F. rascaille is also verified by the occurrence of the Walloon rascaille = mod. F. racaille (Sigart). Note also M. E. rasskayle, Rich. the Redeles, ii. 129; rascall, Boke of St. Albans, fol. e. 1.

RASH (3). In the Anglo-French Bestiary by Philip de Thaurin, l. 371, we read of an animal who is able 'detrencher grauz arbres e racher,' which Mr. Wright explains by 'cut down and fell great trees.' It is rather to 'root up,' from Lat. radicare, used with the sense of eradicate.

RAVEN (2). The Anglo-F. ravine is actually found with the sense of 'rapine,' as suggested; it occurs in Langtoft's Chron. ii. 346, and Liber Custumarum, p. 18. See just below.

RAVENOUS. The connection with M. E. ravine, plunder, appears clearly in Caxton's tr. of Reynard (1481). In c. 32 (ed. Arber, p. 92, l. 27), we find 'couetyse [covetousness] and rauyne;' and just before (p. 90, l. 40) 'thise couetouse and rauenous shrewys.' In the Coventry Myst. p. 228, we find 'ravenous bestes.'

RAYAH. It occurs in Byron, Bride of Abydos, ii. 20. A note says: 'Rayahs, all who pay the capitation-tax, called the Haratch.'

REARWARD. Cf. Anglo-F. rere-warde, a rear-guard, Langtoft's Chron. i. 18; spelt reregard, id. ii. 282.

REBECK. Not (F., -Ital., -Pers.), but (F., -Ital., -Arab.) See Devic, Supp. to Littré; he gives the Arab. name as rabab or rabiba.

REBUKE. Cf. Anglo-F. rebuke, imp. sing., rebuke thou, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 108.

RECLUSE. The masc. form reclus also occurs, as 'the reclus frere,' i.e. the recluse friar; Fifty Earl. E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 7, l. 31. And again: 'the reclus of Shirbourn, whos surname is Arthour,' id. p. 10 (A.D. 1395). In Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 4 (ed. Arber, p. 9, l. 3), a final e is added to the masc. form: 'he lyueth as a recluse.'

RECOIL. Also spelt recule, in the sense 'retreat'; Eng. Garner, vii. 126, 133 (ab. 1606). 'I recule, I go backe, Je recule; Se howe yonder gonne reculeth,' &c.; Palsgrave. Cf. Anglo-F. recuillant, recoiling, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 176; se recolt, recoils, id. ii. 292.

REDGUM. a disease of infants. (E.) Fully explained in my Notes to P. Plowman, C. xxiii. 83, p. 444. M. E. reed gounde, Prompt. Parv. — A. S. readd, red; gund, matter of a sore.

REDOUBT. Not (Ital., — L.), but (F., — Ital., — L.). Ben Jonson has redouts, Underwoods, lxxxix. l. 8; according to Mr. Palmer, some editions give the spelling reduits. Cotgrave has reduite, 'a block-house, or little fort;' from Lat. reducta, pp. fem. of reducere; this is the corresponding F. word. But Littré shews that the F. redoute, a redoubt, was in use in the 16th century, and from this the E. word was borrowed. The F. redoute is from Ital. ridotto; so that the article is otherwise correct.

REGRET. Cf. Anglo-F. regretant, pres. pt., bewailing, in Wace, St. Nicholas, l. 187 (12th cent.).

RELAY. 'Then all the relais thow may vpon hem [the harts] make, Even at [their] comyng, yf thow lett thy howndys goo;' Book of St. Albans, fol. e 8, back.

RELIGION. The connection of Lat. religio with religare is advocated by many; see Lewis and Short, also Max Müller's Hibbert Lectures, p. 12.

RELINQUISH. Cf. Anglo-F. relinquiz, pp. pl.; Stat. of the Realm, i. 252; A.D. 1326.

RELY. In his book 'On English adjectives in -able,' Dr. F. Hall supposes rely to be connected with M. E. relye, to rally (already noticed by me under Rally) and M. E. releuen, to lift up again, from F. relever, which seem to have been confused. The numerous instances of these verbs given in his notes, at pp. 158–160, should be consulted. It is certainly possible that these verbs, now both obsolete, had something to do with suggesting our modern verb. But it clearly took up a new sense, and is practically, as now used, a compound of re and lie (1). The M. E. relye answers to an O. F. reliev = Lat. religare, to bind.

REPLEVY. Cf. Anglo-F. replevi, pp. replevied; Stat. of the Realm, i. 161 (an. 1311); Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 13.

REPUTE. To the derivatives add repute, sb., Shak. Troil. i. 3. 337.

REDOS. Spelt reddos in 1463; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 30.

RESCUE. We find rescu as a sb. in the Cov. Mysteries, p. 114. Either the sb. was formed anew from the verb, or the M. E. rescous was supposed to be a pl. form. This may account for Mrs. Quickly's remark—'bring a rescue or two'; 2 Hen. IV. ii. 1. 62.

RESIDUE. The final -e indicates the fem. gender, as occurring in the Anglo-F. phrase somme residue, the residue, Stat. of the Realm, i. 344, an. 1353. So also ague is a fem. form.

RETAIL. Cf. Anglo-F. a retail, by retail, Stat. of the Realm, i. 178, an. 1318; en retaille, id. 313, an. 1351.

RETRIEVE. The use of the word as a term of the chase is proved by the occurrence of M. E. retriuer, a retriever (dog), in the Book of St. Albans, fol. b 3, back; and of the verb retriue, said of a hawk, in the same, fol. b 4. See also the remark upon Contrive, above.

REVEILLE. 'So soon love beats revellies [revellies?] in her breast;' Davenant, Gondibert, b. iii. c. 5. st. 1.

REVERIE, REVERY. The connection between revery and rave is well illustrated by the use of the word ravery in the sense of 'raving,' which occurs in Gauden, Tears of the Church, 1659, p. 366. See Davies, Supp. Glossary. So also the Anglo-F. reverye means 'a raving'; Langtoft's Chron. ii. 168.

REWARD. Anglo-F. rewarder, v., Langtoft's Chron. i. 176.

RHUBARB. M. E. rubarbe (14th cent.); Reliq. Antiquæ, i. 55.

RIBAND. Scheiler notes that the Low Lat. rubanus first occurs A.D. 1367; see Ducange. We already find the Anglo-F. pl. rubaignes, and sing. rubayn in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 380, 381, an. 1363, and the M. E. pp. rybanyd, adorned with gold threads, in P. Plowman, A. ii. 13 (foot-note), an. 1362.

RICE. We find in Mandeville's Trav. p. 310, the form ryzs.

RINGDOVE. Put for ring'd dove. 'The rynged dove, le ramier;' appendix to Palsgrave (1852), p. 911, col. 2.

ROAN. We find 'a ronyd colte,' i.e. roan-coloured colt, as early as A.D. 1538; Bury Wills, ed. Tymms, p. 132. Surely the derivation from Rouen is mere rubbish.

ROCK (1). There seems to have been an A. S. rocc, gen. pl. rocca; so that the E. word may have been borrowed directly from Celtic. This strengthens the evidence for a Celtic origin. 'Scopulorum, stánrocca,' i.e. of stone-rocks; Mone, Quellen, p. 367.

ROODLOFT. M. E. rodelofte, A.D. 1431, Early E. Wills. ed. Furnivall, p. 90, l. 8. See Loft, which is of Scand. origin.

ROOK (2). The explanation, that the name is from the Skt. roka, a boat, such (perhaps) having been the orig. shape of the piece (D. Forbes, Hist. of Chess, pp. 161, 211), cannot be right. The Pers. rokh cannot = Skt. roka.

ROOT (2). Cf. 'earth-wroting snout;' Return from Parnassus, A. iii. sc. 4.

ROSE. To be marked as (F., — L., — Gk., — Arab., — Pers.?) Rose is, after all, an Aryan word; the Arab. ward is really the Armenian ward, and the word is of Iranian origin; Curtius, i. 438.

ROWLOCK, ROLLOCK, RULLOCK. The history of this word is imperfectly known; in Ashe's Dict. (1775) it is oddly spelt rowlack. The true A. S. word was árloc (Ettmüller); we find 'columbaria, ár-locu,' Wright's Voc. i. 63. Hence M. E. orlok, Liber Albus, pp. 235, 237, 239. This word is compounded of A. S. dr, an oar, and loc, cognate with G. lock, a hole, as is evident from comparing G. ruderlock or rudergat, a rowlock, rullock, or oar-hole. The A. S. loc is also allied to A. S. loca = the modern E. lock, in the sense of 'fastening'; and is derived from loc-en, the pp. of the strong verb lucan, to lock, fasten; see Lock (1). The orig. oar-fastenings or rullocks were, at least in some cases, actual holes; and hence at a later period we find them called oar-holes. In a Nominal pr. in Wright's Voc. i. 239, we find: 'Hoc columbar, are-hole,' whereupon the editor notes that it means 'an air-hole, a small unglazed window.' This is quite wrong; are is the Northern form of oar, and columbar is for Lat. columbare. In Hexham's Du. Dict. the O. Du. riemgaten and roeigaten are explained by 'the oare-holes to put out the oares.' Hence, in the word rullock, we know that -lock signifies 'hole.' And, as to the whole word, I believe it to be nothing but another form of M. E. orlok, i.e. oarlock. The shifting of r is common in English; and, in this instance, it was assisted by confusion with the verb to row, and (possibly) with the O. Du. roeigat. If so, the spelling rowlock is merely due to popular etymology; it does not express the pronunciation. Worcester's Dict. gives the form rollock, which is even better than rullock (etymologically).

RUBBISH. Another extract, shewing that the word was orig. a plural form, is: 'ony rubyes, dung, or rycsshes' [rushes]; Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 91. Cf. Anglo-F. robous, roubouse; Liber Albus, pp. 579, 581.

RUFF (4), a game at cards. (F.) Mentioned in Cotgrave, and in Florio (1598); and see Nares. Now applied to the act of trumping instead of following suit, but orig. the name of a game (called also trump) like whist. Evidently a modification of F. ronfle, 'hand-ruffe, at cards'; jouer à la ronfle, 'to play at hand-ruffe, also to snore'; Cot. So also Ital. ronfa, 'a game at cards called ruffe or trumpe'; ronfare, 'to snort, snarle; also, to ruff or trump at cards'; Florio. Prob. of jocular origin, the trumping (when perhaps unexpected) being likened to a snarl, or the spitting of a cat; cf. ronfamenti, 'snortings, snarlings, or tuffings of a cat'; Florio. Of imitative origin; cf. Ital. ronzare, 'to humme or buzze,' Florio; Span. roncar, 'to snore, also, to threaten, boast, brag.' Cf. brag as the name of a game, slam, also a game, and trump, i.e. trump.

RUMOUR. Anglo-F. rumour, Liber Albus, p. 462.

RUSSET. Anglo-F. russet, Stat. of the Realm, i. 381, an. 1363.

SABLE. 'Lettres enameld with sable and asure;' Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 81 (1481). Sable and azure are the heraldic names for black and blue.

SACK (3). Spelt secke, A. Borde, Dyetary, ch. x. ed. Furnivall, p. 25 (1542).

SAFEGUARD. Spelt saufgarde in Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox, c. 3; ed. Arber, p. 7, l. 3.

SAFFRON. Anglo-F. saffran, Liber Albus, p. 224.

SAGO. Spelt sagu in 1608; N. and Q. 2 S. xii. 391.

SALAD. So also Span. ensalada, salad, orig. herbs dressed with salt, oil, &c. The notion of seasoning with salt was orig. implied in salad, but in course of time it has come to pass that salting has very little to do with what it now implies. Cf. N. and Q. 3 S. x. 178.

SALAMANDER. Anglo-F. salamandre, Philip de Thauin, Bestiary, l. 660.

SALARY. Anglo-F. salarie, Liber Albus, p. 48.
SALMON. Anglo-F. saumon, pl., Life of Edw. Conf. II. 2129, 2178 (cf. E. salmon as a pl. form); also salmuns, pl., Gaimar's Chron. I. 445.
SALT-CELLAR. The M.E. saler precisely answers to the Anglo-F. saler, a salt-cellar, Liber Custumarum, p. 461.
SALTIER. In the Book of St. Albans, pt. II. fol. f 5, we find M.E. saltory, O.F. saultier, and Lat. saltatorium, all meaning 'saltier.' This proves the etymology.
SANCTUARY. Anglo-F. saintuarie, Stat. of the Realm, i. 298, an. 1341.
SAND-BLIND, semi-blind, half blind. (E.) In Shak., Merch. Ven. II. 2. 37. A corruption of sam-blind, i.e. half-blind. M.E. sam-, as in sam-rede, half red, sam-ripe, half ripe, P. Plowman, C. ix. 311, and footnote. A.S. sām-, as in sām-cuc, half alive, Luke, x. 30. The A.S. sām- is cognate with L. sēmi-, Gk. ἡμι-; see Semi-, Hemi-.
SARDINE (2), a gem. Cf. Anglo-F. sardines, pl., sardine-stones, Gaimar's Chron. 4888.
SARDIUS, a gem. (L., -Gk.) In Rev. xxi. 20. -Lat. sardius, (Vulgate). -Gk. σάρδιος, Rev. xxi. 20; the same as σάρδιον, a gem of Sardis.
SAUNTER. We find these examples—'Thoo sawes schall rewe hym sore For all his saunteryng sone;' York Mysteries, p. 351, l. 69. 'Nowe all his gaudis nothyng hym gaynes, His sauntering schall with bale be bought;' id. p. 354, l. 150. The dialect is Northern; the word seems to mean 'venturesomeness.'
SAWYER. Spelt sawiar, Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 272.
SAXIFRAGE. M.E. saxifrage, Book of St. Albans, fol. a 5, back, l. 2. We find O.F. saxifrage, Low Lat. saxifragium, in a gloss of the 13th cent., in Wright's Voc. p. 140, l. 7.
SCALE (1). For A.S. scale, cf. 'Glumula, scale, hule, egle,' Mone, Quellen, p. 360. 'Quisquilia, fyrinpa, beán-scalu,' i.e. bean-shells; id. 343.
SCALLION, a plant allied to the garlic and onion. (F., -L., -Gk., -Phœnician.) Phillips, ed. 1706, gives both scallion and shalot. -O.F. escalogne, a scallion; see further under Shallot.
SCARCE. Anglo-F. escars, niggard, sparing, Philip de Thaun, Bestiary, l. 602; cf. escarcelte, scarcity, Polit. Songs, p. 186 (before 1307).
SCARF (1). We find the form sharpe (representing F. escharpe), A.D. 1439; Early E. Wills, ed. Furnival, p. 117, l. 8.
SCHEDULE. Spelt sedull in the Will of Lady Margaret (1508); Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 365. The Anglo-F. cedule occurs in the same volume, p. 411 (A.D. 1422).
SCION. So too sioun in Wyclif, Ps. 79, l. 12.
SCORCH. Perhaps (Scand.). I do not feel sure that the etymology given at p. 532 is wrong. The chief difficulty is that pointed out by Wedgwood, that the derivation from the French does not explain the M.E. words scorened and scorkle, which seem to be related. If they are unrelated, I may be right; otherwise, we must take them into account, in which case we are led, as I think, to a Scand. original. Scorened occurs in the Ormulum, 8626: 'For þatt to land wass drizzedd all, And scorennedd þurh þe druhþe.' 'Scorkelyn, ustulo' and 'Scorklyd, ustillatus' occur in the Prompt. Parv. Wedgwood cites a passage from Chaucer's tr. of Boethius in which the word scorelith occurs; but this is only the passage which I have cited already, in which the best MSS. read scorechilp; though the printed editions have scorelith, which is the spelling given by Richardson. Now it is obvious that score-le is a frequentative form, whilst score-nen contains the suffix -na so common in Scandinavian; we are thus led to expect a Teutonic, and in particular a Scand. origin. This may, I think, be found in the strong Norweg. verb skrekka, to shrink, become wrinkled up, more commonly spelt skrökk, pt. t. skrökk or skrokk, pp. skrokhet, whence the adj. skrokken, shrunk up, evidently originally a strong pp., which actually produced the verb skrokkna, to be shrivelled up, the exact equivalent of the M.E. score-n-en. Similarly, the Swed. dial. skrökk-la, to wrinkle, corresponds to score-le. Numerous related forms are given under Shrug and Scrag, which see. The verb to shrink has a in the pt. tense (cf. scrag), and u in the pp. (cf. shrug); the nk becomes kk in Norwegian and Danish, as usual. Then the kk is weakened to gg or g; and this at once accounts for the Low G. (Osnabrück) schröggen, to scorch, singe, given in the Bremen Wörterbuch, iv. 698, where we also learn that schröggen was further weakened to schroien in Low G.; cf. Du. schroeijen, to scorch. As to the sense, the notion of scorching easily results from that of shrinking or shriveling. Perhaps mod. E. scorech resulted from a confusion of the Scand. word with O.F. escorcher.
SCORE. We find 'v. scora scæp,' five score sheep; and 'viii score æcere,' eight score acres, in the MS. containing the Rule of St. Bennet in Corp. Chr. Coll. Oxon., fol. 108.

SCRAMBLE. Scrabble for scramble occurs in the Pilgrim's Progress. We also find scribble in the sense of a hasty walk. See extracts in Davies, Supp. Glossary.
SCREW. It has been shewn that E. screw is from O.F. escroue, a screw, orig. used of the hole in which the male screw works. Also that the O.F. escroue answers in form to the Lat. acc. serobem, a ditch, groove. All that is now needed is to supply the train of thought which connects screw with Lat. serobs. This I can now do. The explanation is that the Low Lat. serobs was particularly used of the hole made by swine when rooting up the ground; so that screwing was, originally, the boring action of these animals. 'Hic serobs, Anglice, a swyn-wrotyng;' Wright's Voc. i. 271, col. 1, last line; and see Catholicorum Anglicum, p. 99, note 11.
SCROLL. Actually spelt escroll in Guillim, Display of Heraldry (1664), p. 400. See also Escrow (above, p. 802). We find Anglo-F. escrouet, Stat. of the Realm, i. 190, an. 1322. This word only differs from escrou-el in the form of the dimin. suffix.
SCULLERY. Cf. Anglo-F. seuiler, a washer of dishes, Life of Edw. Conf. I. 992. This is merely M.E. squiller (= suiller) turned into apparent French. The etymology already given is strongly confirmed by the actual use of scullery in the sense of off-scourings. 'The black pots among which these doves must lie, I mean the soot and skullery of vulgar insolency;' Gauden, Tears of the Church, 1659, p. 258. See Davies, Supp. Glossary.
SCUPPER. Perhaps (F., -L.). The derivation of O.F. escopir from Lat. exspuere is not to be too lightly rejected. Cihac explains the Wallachian scuip-ire from exspuere, which he supposes became scupere, transposed for (e)c-spuere; the sense answers exactly. He instances the remarkable Port. form cuspir (also cospir), to spit, which is certainly from Lat. conspuere. For an early example of the word, cf. 'That gushes from out our galleries' scupper-holes;' J. Marston, Antonio and Mellida, i. 1, 13 (1602).
SCUTTLE (3). Cf. 'How the misses did huddle, and scuddle, and run!' Anstey, New Bath Guide, letter 13 (Davies). Davies also gives scutter, a hasty, noisy run; scuttering, a hasty pace.
SEAM (2), a horse-load. (Low L., -Gk.) 'A seame of corn, eight bushels; a seam of wood, an horse-load;' Ray's Gloss., E. D. S., B. 16. M.E. seem, P. Plowman, B. iv. 38. A.S. seām; occurring, e.g., in the comp. seām-pending, a load-penny, toll for a load, Thorpe, Diplom. Ævi Saxonici, p. 138, l. 13. Not a Teut. word, but borrowed (like G. saum) from Low Lat. sauma, salma, corrupt forms of sagma, a pack, horse-load. -Gk. σάγμα, a pack-saddle. See further under Sumpter (where a notice of seam should have been inserted). See Weigand, s. v. Saum.
SEARCH. Cf. Anglo-F. sercher, Stat. of the Realm, i. 274, an. 1335; earlier cercher, id. 219, an. 1284. Thus the initial c became s in Anglo-French, and we find the spelling sercher in the very book (Langtoft's Chron. i. 112) which Rob. of Brunne translated. Cf. selles, i.e. cells, in P. Plowman, B. p. 28.
SEASON. The etymology given is verified by the occurrence of Anglo-F. seson in the express and limited sense of 'sowing-time.' Thus we find 'furment, segle, et mixtilon pur la seson yvernaile,' i.e. wheat, rye, and meslin [mixed corn] for the winter sowing; and 'feves, pois, et vesces pur la seson quaremele,' i.e. beans, peas, and vetches for the Lent sowing; Will of Lady Clare (1355); see Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, pp. 34, 35.
SECULAR. We find Anglo-F. seculer, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 59, 133. It may be noted here that the senses assigned to secularis belong to late ecclesiastical Latin. The older sense was 'recurring at a saeculum,' which was a stated period of considerable length.
SEISIN. Anglo-F. seisina, Stat. of the Realm, i. 36, an. 1275. See Seize, p. 539.
SENIOR. The word occurs, spelt senyor, in The Monk of Eve-sham (ab. 1412), c. x., ed. Arber, p. 31.
SENTINEL, SENTRY. I do not pretend to decide as to this difficult word, about which Scheler, Litttré, and Diez differ. If we trust to the form, the most likely origin seems to be the Lat. sentina; for which reason I would remark that Lewis and Short cite a passage from Valerius Maximus, 2. 7. 1, in which sentina has the sense of 'hangers-on of an army, camp-followers.' Wedgwood explains senry from O.F. senieret, and sentinel from O.F. sentine, both in the sense of path, with allusion to the sentinel's beat. The objection is that the word is said, by Scheler, Litttré, and Brachet, to be of Italian origin; Litttré has no example earlier than the 15th century.
SEPOY. Spelt in two ways in mod. F., viz. cipaye and spahi.
SERAPH. See note in Cheyne's Isaiah, vi. 2: 'the popular notion of the Seraphim as angels is of course to be rejected.' It is of mythical origin, orig. denoting serpent forms. Cheyne considers the seráphim of Isaiah to be the same word as seráphim, 'burning serpents' in Numbers, xxi. 6, so called from their burning bite.—A. L. M.

SET (2). When we speak of 'a set of things,' this is a peculiar use of Sept, q.v. Not allied to the verb to set, in my opinion. A set = a suit; see Suit.

SEWER (1). Mr. Palmer, in his Folk-Etymology, p. 355, points out another possible original for sewer, viz. O. F. seuwiere, a canal for conducting water (Roquefort).—Lat. ex-aquaria, i.e. that which conducts water out.—Lat. ex, out; and aquaria, fem. of aquarius, belonging to water, adj., from aqua, water. This is a highly probable solution, for the Lat. aqua became eue in O. Fr., and the Lat. aquaria is precisely E. euer; so that s-euer = ex-euer; see Ewer. We actually find Anglo-F. Ewers, i.e. water-bearer, as a proper name, in the Liber Custumarum, p. 684. If this solution be right, then the verb to sew was evolved out of the sb. sewer.

¶ Mr. Palmer misunderstands F. évier, a sink, which he wrongly supposes to be the same word; but, as Scheler points out, évier (though formerly miswritten esvier, as in Cotgrave) is merely the same word as E. euer (or sewer without the s), being derived from O. F. eue, water, another form of the word which in mod. F. appears as eau. The remarkable Anglo-F. form asseue, dried up, in the Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 417, can hardly be anything else than = F. assuë; which shews how nearly forms resulting from exaquaria and from exsucare may resemble each other. See prov. E. assue (Halliwell).

SEXTON. The change of a into e already appears in the Anglo-F. seerestein, Life of Edw. Conf. i. 1998.

SHAD. The A. S. form is properly scedd; the form scedda is the gen. pl., and occurs in Thorpe, Diplomatarium Ævi Saxonici, p. 544.

SHALLOON. Anglo-F. Chalouns, Chalons, cloth of Chalons, Liber Albus, pp. 225, 231. Chalons took its name from the tribe of the Catalauni.

SHALLOT. Rather (F., —L., —Gk., —Phœnician). Spelt shalot in Phillips, ed. 1706; see F. échalote in Littré. Closely allied to scallion, from O. F. escalone, eschaloigne (given by Littré under échalote). These forms answer to Low Lat. ascolonium, given in the Epinal Glossary, but better spelt ascalonium.—Gk. Ἀσκαλόν, the name of a Philistine city called in Heb. ʾAshqalón. See Scallion.

SHAM. In North's Examen, 1740, p. 256, he mentions 'a pure and pute sham-plot;' where pute represents Lat. putus. Again, at p. 231, he says: 'This term of art, sham-plot, should be decyphered. The word sham is true cant of the Newmarket breed. It is contracted of ashamed. The native signification is a town lady of diversion in country maid's cloaths, who, to make good her disguise, pretends to be so 'sham'd'. Thence it became proverbial, when a maimed lover was laid up, or looked meager, to say he had met with a sham. But what is this to plots? The noble Captain Dangerfield, being an artist in all sorts of land piracy, translated this word out of the language of his society to a new employment he had taken up of false plotting. And as with them, it ordinarily signifies any false or counterfeit thing, so, annexed to a plot, it means one that is fictitious and untrue; and being so applied in his various writings and sworn depositions . . . it is adopted into the English language.'

β. We must here distinguish between fact and guess. North's explanation, that sham is short for asham'd, is a guess which I do not believe. On his own shewing the phrase ran, that a man had 'met with a sham,' i.e. with a shame or disgrace, hence, a trick, and, finally, 'any false or counterfeit thing,' to use North's words. This is at once a simpler and a more intelligible explanation, and agrees with all the other evidence, as I have already shewn. 'He [Sir R. L'Estrange] gave himself the trouble to print, in a quarto pamphlet, entitled The Shammer shammed, 1681, the whole transaction adorned with all the circumstances;' North's Examen, 1740, p. 271. The 'meal-tub' plot, in relation to which Dangerfield appeared as a witness, took place in 1680. Note that the word occurs in Wycherley's Plain Dealer, A. iii. sc. 1, where the verb to sham simply means to shame or mock: 'I'm sure you joked upon me, and shammed me all night long.' This play was brought out in 1677, and written as early as 1665; we thus have an example earlier than anything to which North refers.

SHAMMY, SHAMOY. So again, Cotgrave explains F. ysard as 'the shamois, or wild goat, of whose skin chamois leather is made.' Coles (1684) gives the same account. The G. gemsenleder, chamois leather, is clearly from gemse, chamois, and not from Samland.

SHAWM. The pl. forms shalmouse, shalmoyes, in Caxton, tr. of Reynard, ed. Arber, p. 54, l. 15, and p. 112, l. 30, answer to the F. pl. chalumeaux.

seō was used as the fem. of se, it really took its origin from a slightly different form. In Skt. we not only find sa, fem. sā (Benfey, p. 981), but another form syas, that, fem. syā, neut. tyad (p. 376). Now the fem. sā is the same as Gk. ῥή, Goth. so, Icel. sú; but the fem. syā is the same as O. H. G. siu, mod. G. sie, O. Icel. sjá, A. S. seō, mod. E. she. It is remarkable that Icelandic has both forms sú and sjá (the latter being obsolete). Hence E. she is the fem. of an Aryan form SA-YA, a demonstrative form compounded of the two Aryan demonstr. forms SA and YA. For the latter, see Yon.

SHED (1). I find that the alleged A. S. sceddan, to shed, is given by Mätzner. In his Grammar, he cites A. S. sceddan, pt. t. scōd, scēōd, pp. scaden, to shed, which he says was confused in M. E. with A. S. sceddan, to sever. All this is pure assumption, and rests upon Ettmüller, who assumes the form sceddan for his own purposes. He grounds it upon the phrase 'tō scedende blōd, to shed blood, occurring as a various reading in Ps. xiii. 16, ed. Spelman; this is assumed to be miswritten for sceddende = sceddanne, whereas it may very well be quite right, and = sceddanne. Next he assumes that the pt. t. is scōd, though scōd is only found with the totally unconnected sense of 'injured,' and is rightly regarded by Grein as the pt. t. of sceaðan, to scathe or injure. Both these assumptions are made with the object of forcing a connection between E. shed and G. schütten, to shed, of which the orig. sense was to shake, and to which the related E. word is Shudder, q.v. Even then, when Ettmüller has constructed this A. S. verb after his own plan, he has further to assume a root-verb scudan, in order to get over the difference in the vowel-sound between shed and shudder. The whole is very suspicious, and the only real point of connection between these verbs is such as is afforded by O. Fries. schedda, to shake violently. The necessary conclusion is, that one or other of the following views must be true. Either shed, in the sense to spill or scatter, is the same word with shed, to part (A. S. sceddan), to which I see no objection, for the phr. 'tō scedende blōd,' cited above, tells this way rather than the other; or else shed, to spill, is a different word, and had the original sense of 'shake,' being connected with O. Fries. schedda, from a base SKAD, to shake, of which I can find no trace beyond a possible connection with the base SKUD, to shake, for which see Shudder. With the A. S. sceddan, to part, we may also further compare O. Sax. skēdan, O. Fries. skētha, seēda, to part. It is also highly material to observe that the verb to shed, in the sense 'to separate,' though originally a strong verb, is formed with the weak pt. t. shadde and the weak pp. shad as early as in the Ormulum; see ll. 3200, 4939. The very same forms have the sense of 'split' in P. Plowman, B. xvii. 288, &c. B. But the most material point is to observe the change of sense. We have A. S. scedan, to part; M. E. shaden (pt. t. shadde), to part, Ormulum, 1209, 3200; but the verb became intransitive, so that, in Layamon, 5187, we have 'redde blod scede (or sadde),' red blood spread abroad, or was shed. Lastly, it again became transitive in a new sense, as in Layamon, 7650, where we have 'one blodes drope sadde,' he shed a drop of blood. This is the real key to the whole matter.

SHED (2). I find no older quotation for this word in the modern sense than the following: 'Sheds stuff'd with lambs and goats, distinctly kept;' Chapman, tr. of Homer's Odyssey, ix. 314. We find also prov. E. shade, a shed for fuel (East Yorksh.), cow-shade, a cow-shed (Leicestershire), E. D. S. Gloss. B. 2 and B. 5; Shropsh. shad, a shed. These forms are sufficient to justify my inference, that shed is a mere variant of shade. β. But there is also a prov. E. shud, a shed (E. D. S. B. 3); this is M. E. schudde, a shed (Prompt. Parv.). It is of Scand. origin; cf. Swed. skydd, protection, skydda, to protect, shelter; from the same root as Sky, q.v. γ. Thus, whilst on the one hand, the ✓SKA, to cover, is the source of shade and shed, on the other hand the closely allied ✓SKU, to cover, is the source of shud.

SHEET-ANCHOR. The spelling shootanker occurs also in Roister Doister, i. 1. 28. The spelling of sheet-anchor is due to M. E. scheten, to shoot. See remarks already made, s. v. Sheet, and see Shoot.

SHELTER. We actually find the corrupt form jeltron, but used in the sense of 'shield' or 'shelter,' in Hickscorner; Dodsley's Old Plays, i. 149. This links shelter with M. E. sheltrown, past all question.

SHERRY. The name of the Spanish town is spelt both Xerez and Sherris on the same page (A. D. 1626); see An English Garner, ed. Arber, i. 632; also Sherries, id. i. 621.

SHILLELAGH, an oaken stick used as a cudgel. (Irish). In The Rejected Addresses (Living Lustres, st. 9). Named from Shillelagh, a barony in Wicklow famous for oaks. The Irish name Siol-Elaigh means 'the descendants of Elach.'—Irish siol, seed, descendants; and Elach, proper name. See Joyce, Irish Local Names. The O. Irish síl, seed, is from ✓SA, to sow; Fick. i. 789.

SHINGLE. 'Their haven is so . . . often stopped up with beach and shingle stone,' &c. (A.D. 1614); Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, iv. 338. [As the English Garner has modernised spelling, we cannot tell what was the spelling of the original here.]

SHITTAH. Heb. ṣṭ for ṣṭ, which is quite regular; cf. Arab. sant, a thorn, an acacia; Rich. Dict. p. 853. Of Egyptian origin; from Egypt. schonte; Gesenius, ed. 8, p. 830. The acacia is called the spina Aegyptia. So in Smith's Dict. of the Bible.—A. L. M.

SHOAL (1). Cf. 'a Scoll of Fysh'; Book of St. Albans, fol. f 7, col. 1, l. 12.

SHOG. The pp. schoggid, i. e. shaken about, occurs as early as in Wyclif, Matt. xiv. 24. See schoggyn in Prompt. Parv.

SHOVEL. Oldest spelling scobl, in the 8th century. 'Vatilla, tsern scobl,' i. e. iron shovel, Wright's Voc. ii. 123, col. 1. Cf. 'Batilla, fyr-scobl,' i. e. fire-shovel, id. ii. 11, col. 1.

SHY. The verb exactly answers to Swed. sky, to shun.

SIBYL. Prof. Postgate takes Σιβυλλα to be from a stem σιβ-υλο-, with a fem. suffix -ya. He remarks that the root would appear to be σιβ-; cf. persibus in Festus, who has: 'callidus sive acutus, persibus;' from the ✓SAP, to be wise, seen in Lat. sap-ere, Gk. σοφ-ός. Thus Sibyl would mean 'the wise woman,' or perhaps 'the little wise woman'; so named because she knows the secrets of destiny. I may add that this etymology agrees with the fact that F. sage can only be derived from sabius, not from sapius; see Sage (1).

SIEGE. The Anglo-F. forms are both siege, Liber Custumarum, p. 140, and sege, Gaimar's Chron. i. 3110.

SIESTA. orig. a noon-day nap. (Span., = L.) 'What, sister, at your siesta already?' Elvira, in Dodsley's Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, xv. 22. Now usually applied to a nap in the afternoon. = Span. siesta, 'the hottest part of the day, the time for taking a nap after dinner, generally from 1 to 3 o'clock'; Neuman. = Lat. sexta, i. e. sexta hora, sixth hour, noon; reckoning from 6 A.M.; so that the orig. sense was 'noonday nap.' Sexta is fem. of Lat. sextus, sixth. = Lat. sex, six; see Six. For a shifting of time in the reverse direction, see Noon.

SIGNET. Spelt signett, Mandeville's Trav. p. 82. Anglo-F. signet, Royal Wills, p. 80 (1361).

SILK. It is suggested by Slavonic scholars that the change of the r of sericum into l took place on Slav ground. The Russ. form is shelke (sholk); [cf. Lithuan. szilkai, silk, silkai, cotton]. It is probable that silk became known to the Scandinavians and Saxons through Slavonic traders.—A. L. M.

SIMPLETON. Mr. Palmer suggests that simpleton is short for simple-tony, the word tony having much the same meaning, of 'foolish fellow.' We find the line: 'I think a simple-tony,' introduced into a song (about A.D. 1772?), where a rime for macaroni is required; and again: 'A bow from any tony' in another song, in which every verse ends with macaroni; both are quoted in Chambers, Book of Days, ii. 32. Prior, in his poem 'The Mice,' written in 1708, introduces the line: 'Home went, well pleas'd, the Suffolk tony.' Cf. Tony (i. e. Anthony) Lumpkin in Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer. On the other hand, it may be that simple-tony is merely an extended form of simpleton, and that tony is short for it. At present, the evidence points this way, since simpleton is used by L'Estrange, who died in 1704; and examples of -ton at the end of F. words are given in N. and Q. vi. 8. 132; e.g. caneton, molleton, hanneton. Cf. Span. simpion, a simpleton; Ital. semplicione, a simpleton.

SIMULATE. The sb. symulacyon occurs in The Monk of Evesham (ab. 1482), c. 36; ed. Arber, p. 79.

SINGLE. The M. E. form sengle (P. Plowm. A. x. 200) is from F. sengle (Cot.); but single is from Latin, or is a form adapted to the Lat. spelling.

SIRE. Anglo-F. sire, Polit. Songs, p. 232 (before 1307); and in the Vie de St. Auban.

SIREN. See 'A Philological Examination of the Myth Sirens,' by J. P. Postgate, in the Journal of Philology (Cambridge), vol. ix. The conclusion is that siren meant orig. 'a bird,' and that the root is ✓SWAR, to sound. This confirms what I have already said.

SIZE (1). The expression 'feet of assize,' i. e. statutable feet, feet of a fixed length, occurs in a [late?] copy of the Will of Hen. VI.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 295. This throws much light on the word.

SIZE (2). Cf. 'syse for colours, colle de cuir,' Palsgrave. It occurs even in the 15th cent., being spelt eyse in Reliq. Antiq. i. 108.

SKIRMISH. Cf. Anglo-F. eshermir, to fence, Lib. Custumarum, p. 282. The suffix -ish is not really due to the sb., as said at p. 558, but the verb is derived (regularly) from the base eshermiss- of the pres. part., &c.; just as is the case with ban-ish, pol-ish, and the like. Thus, Littré quotes the pr. pl. eshermissent from Roncisvals, p. 6; and the same form occurs in Le Roman de Rou, in Bartsch, Chrest. Franc. col. 112, l. 28. Roquefort also gives the pres. sing. subj.

eshermiss-, from Gautier de Coinsi, liv. i. ch. 10. This settles the question.

SKUA. a bird, a kind of gull. (Scand.) 'Lestris cataractes, the common skua;' Engl. Encycl. s.v. Larida. Apparently a corruption of Icel. skúfr, a skua; also called skúmr, 'the skua, or brown gull'; Icel. Dict. I suppose the reference is to the colour; cf. Icel. skúmi, shade, dusk; Swed. skum, dusky; Norweg. skum, dull, dusky, chiefly used of the weather, but sometimes of colour. Perhaps allied to Sky.

SLAB (1). Wedgwood objects to my explanation of slab as 'a smooth piece,' though this is certainly what we mean by a slab of stone. He says: 'it corresponds exactly to Languedoc esclapo, a chip, slab of wood or unworked stone, from esclapa, to split wood;' and he further compares F. éclater, to fly into fragments. This makes no difference to the etymology; we may regard slab as meaning merely 'slip' or 'slice,' and it comes to the same result. The Languedoc esclapa, to split, is clearly of Teutonic origin, from the O. Du. slippen, which (as I have already said) means 'to slit' as well as 'to slip'; precisely as F. délat and E. slate are derived from the O. H. G. equivalent of slit; see Slate. The notion of slitting appears also in sliv-er and slice.

SLAVE, sect. β. The name Slave meant, in Slavonic, not 'the glorious,' but 'the intelligible,' or more literally, 'the speaking' people; like other races, they regarded their neighbours as 'barbarian' or 'dumb.' Similarly 'the Poles called their neighbours, the Germans, Niemiec, niemyi meaning dumb; just as the Greeks called the barbarians Aglossoi, or speechless;' Max Müller, Lect. on Lang., 8th ed. i. 97. Accordingly, the derivation of Slave (or rather, of O. Russ. Slovéne, Slavonians, given in Thomsen's Relations between ancient Russia and Scandinavia, p. 8) is from the Church-Slav. slovo, a word (cf. Russ. slovo, Pol. słowo, a word). Still, it hardly disturbs the etymology; for it happens that the Church-Slav. slava, fame, and slovo, a word, are closely allied words, both being connected with Church-Slav. slu-ti, to be named, to be illustrious; from ✓KRU, to hear, p. 732, no. 81. See Curtius, i. 185.

SLEEVELESS. We see, by Richardson's Dict., that the phr. 'sleeveless words' occurs in the Test. of Love, b. ii. (see Chaucer's Works, ed. 1561), fol. 302, col. i; also 'sleeveless rhymes' occurs in Bp. Hall, Sat. iv. 1, 34; and 'a sleeves reson' in Reliquiæ Antiquæ, i. 83 (15th cent.). The explanation turns on some old joke, such as I have indicated. The pretence that it is 'a corruption' is mere pedantry.

SLEIGH. The pl. scleyes occurs in Mandeville's Travels, p. 130. Possibly a F. modification of the Du. or Dan. word. Cf. E. Fries. slé or slède, a sledge.

SLENDER. Not (O. Low G.), but (F., = O. Low G.). It is derived from O. F. esclendre, slender, given by Palsgrave as the F. form of 'sklender.' This at once accounts for the former vowel, as well as for the curious M. E. scleander, Mandeville's Travels, p. 290, scleandre, Chaucer, C. T., Group A, 587. It is the O. F. esclendre that is derived from the O. Du. slinder. We thus account for the vowel-change; in regularly becomes en in French, as in en = Lat. in, sengle from Lat. singulum, &c.

SLEUTH-HOUND. Explained under Slot (2).

SLICE. Cf. Anglo-F. escliciens, splinters; Life of Edw. Conf. I. 276.

SLOUGH (2). 'A slughe, squama; slughes of eddrys [snakes], exemie;' Catholicon Anglicum, p. 345; and see the note.

SLUG-HORN. (C.) I insert this ridiculous word because a certain critic believed it to be worth insertion, and remarked upon the 'fine opportunity' for explaining its connection with slaughter! As a fact, Browning's line: 'Dauntless the slug-horn to my lips I set' (Childe Roland, near the end) is amusing to an editor of Chatterton, who recognises the original of it in 'Some caught a slug-horn, and an onset wound,' Battle of Hastings, pt. ii. st. 10. Unluckily, a slug-horn is not a horn at all; it is merely a spelling, in the edition of G. Douglas which Chatterton consulted, of the word which in Small's edition (iii. 126, l. 29) is better spelt slogorne; see slughorne or sloggorne in Jamieson's Scot. Dict. Slogorne is merely an old spelling of slogan, and means a battle-cry. It will now be understood that I have already inserted and explained it; see p. 563.

SMACK (3). Latinised as esnecca in the Pipe Roll, 2 Rich. I. (1190-1); N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 307.

SOCK. A better quotation for the A. S. word, shewing its early adoption from Latin, is the following. 'Soccus, socc, slébe-scóth,' i. e. sock, slipshoe; Wright's Voc. ii. 120, col. 2 (8th century).

SOFT. I see Weigand is of opinion that the G. sacht was merely borrowed from Low G. sagt, soft, which is allied to Du. zacht, Dan. sagte, soft. If these words are to be connected with E. soft, as he supposes, I think it must be due to the substitution of a guttural sound for f, of which we have instances in the Du. luht (for luft), air, Du. kracht (for kraft), strength, &c. We may thus account for the double form sanft and sacht in German, by supposing the former to be H. G. and the latter borrowed from Low G. We may still take the base to be SÄF-, as seen in the A. S. and O. Sax. forms, the most likely form of the root being SWAP, as already said. Cf. Icel. sof-a, to sleep (pt. t. svaf).

SOIL (1). Cf. Anglo-F. soil, land, Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 53; soyl, id. i. 247.

SOIL (2). 'To go to soyle' was said of the hart; Book of St. Albans, fol. e 4, back, last line.

SOIL (3). Cf. Anglo-F. saulees, pp. pl., satisfied, filled with grass, Philip de Thaur, Bestiary, l. 527; saul, adj. satisfied, Vie de St. Auban.

SOJOURN. Anglo-F. sojourner, Stat. of the Realm, i. 277, an. 1336. The sb. appears in Anglo-F. both as sojour, Lib. Custumarium, pp. 63, 64, and sojourn, Langtoft, i. 36.

SOLE (2). Anglo-F. soel, Lib. Albus, p. 244.

SONATA. 'Of a sonata on his viol;' Prior, Alma, c. 3.

SONOROUS. The M. E. form is sonoure, spelt sonoure in the Book of St. Albans, fol. d 3, l. 4.

SOOTHE. 'That's as much as to say you would tell a monstrous . . . lie, and I shall sooth it,' i.e. I am to bear witness to its truth; Faure Em, Act. iii. sc. 11; in Simpson's School of Shakespeare, ii. 443, l. 866. 'What better way than this? To sooth his purpose and to draw him on With expectation;' Play of Stucley, l. 1516; id. i. 219.

SORCERESS. Anglo-F. sorceresse, French Chron. of London, Camden Soc., p. 3.

SORREL. M. E. sorel, spelt sorell (14th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. i. 51, l. 7.

SPADE (at cards). (Span., = L., = Gk.). The name spade is really a substitution for the Spanish name espada, meaning (1) a sword, (2) a spade at cards; compare the etymology of spadille, given at p. 577, col. 1, l. 9, and see ll. 2-5 just above. The Spanish cards have swords for spades; see Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, b. iv. c. 2, § 20; Archæologia, viii. 135.

SPALPEEN. 'The poor harvest-men who now pass in troops from Ireland to England are now called spalpeens, with a show of contempt or disrespect in using the word,' &c. MS. written ab. 1740, cited in N. and Q. 3 S. viii. 307; q. v. And see under Buckeen in Davies, Suppl. Glossary.

SPANGLE. Spangis, spangles, occurs in the Kingis Quhair, by James I. of Scotland, st. 47.

SPARK (1). In sparkle, verb, the suffix may be frequentative. It is difficult to be certain whether sparkle, verb, is from the sb., or was formed as a frequentative.

SPAWN. The etymology from O. F. espandre or espaundre is rendered certain by a gloss in Wright's Voc. i. 164. We there find: 'Soffret le peysoun en ewe espaundre, i.e. let the fish spawn in the water; espaundre being glossed (in the MS.) by scheden his roune, i.e. shed his roe, though it is misprinted scheden him frome. Hence the word is certainly (F., = L.). So in N. and Q. 6 S. v. 465 (by myself).

SPELL (1). 'Relatu, spell;' Wright's Voc. ii. 118 (8th cent.).

SPELL (2). I have already pointed out the confusion between this word and spell (4), a splinter of wood, owing to the use of a piece of wood as a pointer in schools. Wedgwood argues that spell (2) is, in fact, nothing but a mere derivative of spell (4), and that the A. S. spellian, to declare, relate, may as well be left out of the question. I will not contest this, as it is probable enough; only, in that case, we must assume that M. E. speld, a splinter, took the form spell, ld becoming ll by assimilation. Cf. O. Du. spelle, a pin (Hexham) with Du. speld, a pin, which is still in use, though really an older form; and see Spill (2). Under Spell (2), I have cited Cotgrave as using the curious form speale; this (as Wedgwood well points out) is clearly derived from the old word speal, a splinter of wood (Halliwell), and is of Scand. origin; from Swed. spjåla, a splinter, which is ultimately from the same root.

SPINACH, SPINAGE. Rather (F., = Span., = Arab., = Pers.). Littré gives O. F. espinaçe, which (rather than Ital. spinace), is the origin of the E. word. = Span. espinaça, spinach. S.e. a remarkable article in Devic, Supp. to Littré, p. 33, s.v. épinard. He shews (conclusively, as it appears to me) that the almost universally accepted etymology from Lat. spina is wrong. He cites Jean Bauhin, a botanist of the 16th century, as deriving the word from Hispanicum olus, which points to the Span. origin of the F. word, but is really a mere coincidence; Bauhin adds (what is more important) that no ancient authors mention spinach, except the Arabs, who call it hispanac. The reference is to Bauhin, Histor. Plantarum Univers. ii. 964. Far earlier testimony exists; for Razi, in the 9th century, praises this vegetable in Arabic words which Devic quotes; the name employed being al-isfândj. Richardson's Arab. Dict. gives isfinâj, isfinâj, aspanâkh, all meaning 'spinage'; pp. 90, 75. He considers them as Greek words, from Gk. σπινάκια, but this is a mere modern word, really derived from the Arabic. Devic further cites a quotation in Littré to shew that the spinach came to Spain from the East, and adds that it has been shewn that the plant is indigenous in Persia; for which see G. A. Olivier, Voyage dans l'empire ottoman, 1802. We conclude that the name was introduced into Spain by the Moors, and that the Arab. name was prob. originally Persian. The fact that the suffix -dj is already found in Arabic in the 9th century is strongly against the possibility of its being due to the Lat. -aceus.

SPLAY. So also: 'Here colere splayed,' her collar displayed; Cov. Myst. p. 242.

SPRAY (1). This seems to be a word of such late use, that it can hardly be originally English. Moreover, the A. S. geond-sprengan is a very doubtful word; it may be a mistake for geond-sprengan. I suspect the word will turn out to be a derivative from Du. spreiden, to spread, scatter, strew. The loss of d between two vowels is not uncommon in Du. and Low G.; the Bremen Wörterbuch gives spreën, spreien as varying forms of spreiden. Aasen notes that the Norweg. spreida, to spread, is in some places pronounced as spreis. The d has also disappeared in the derived Low G. spreë (also sprede), a spreading out of flax to dry, Du. sprei, that which is spread on a bed, a coverlet. If this be right, spray is related to spread rather than to sprinkle. The word occurs in Bailey, ed. 1745.

SPROUT. Cf. Walloon sprot, spraut, a term applied to cabbage-sprouts (Sigart).

SPRUCE. Prussia was called Sprucia by the English as late as A.D. 1614; see Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, iv. 329, 345. 'Spruce canuas' is mentioned in Arnold's Chron. (1502), repr. 1811, p. 236.

SPURT. 'A short spurt doth not tire me;' A. Tuckney, Sermon on Balm of Gilead, p. 65; N. and Q. 2 S. viii. 7.

SQUIRREL. We find Anglo-F. esquireus, esquireux, plural forms from a sing. esquirel, in Liber Albus, pp. 225, 231. This is a modification of O. F. escuriel.

STANDARD. In 1392, we find the expression 'un rouge lit estendar,' supposed to mean 'a red standing bed, i.e. one whose taster rested on pillars'; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 131. This again points to the etymology suggested.

STAG. The word seems to have been English; A. S. staggā. In the Laws of Cnut, De Foresta, § 24, we read of 'regalem feram, quam Angli staggon [read staggan] appellant.'

STANK. The dialectic form of F. whence the E. sb. is derived is shown by Walloon stank, estank, a ditch (Sigart). Cf. Anglo-F. estang, a pool, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 415; estank, a mill-dam, id. ii. 451; estanke, Lib. Albus, p. 505.

STANNARY. The Corn. staen, W. ystaen, &c., are borrowed from Latin (Rhys).

STAVE. Mr. Cockayne remarks that 'the A. S. staf, G. buch-stab, a letter, refers to the characters standing in rows. Staves of a psalm are appropriate because there is a row of them;' Spoon and Sparrow, p. 134. Runic characters or staves resemble a row of upright sticks.

STEM (3). Mr. Palmer observes that 'to stem the waves,' being formed from the sb. stem (of a vessel), is a distinct word from 'to stem a torrent.' In a very strict sense, it is so. But I have given them together, because both verbs are derivatives from stem, sb. This sb. has two senses, but one of them is secondary. To 'stem the waves' is from stem (2); to 'stem a torrent' is from stem (1); but stem (2) is the same word as stem (1).

STENCIL. Anglo-F. estencille, pp., Langtoft's Chron. ii. 430.

STINGY. Cf. also Shropsh. stinge, a grudge; as, 'I owed 'im a stinge;' Shropsh. Wordbook.

STOP. Cf. Anglo-F. estoper, to stop up, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 23; estuper, Philip de Thaur, Bestiary, l. 784. The latter form is obviously from Low Lat. stupare.

STORE. The derivation from Lat. instaurare is further shewn by the occurrence of instore. 'All his lande instored of husbondry and of all other thingis;' Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, p. 215.

STRAPPADO. E. Webbe, according to his Travels (1590), ed. Arber, p. 31, had practical experience of it at Naples. 'Thrice had I ye strappado, hoisted vp backward with my hands bound behinde me, which strook all the joynts in my armes out of joynt.'

STRIPLING. M. E. stripling, Mandeville's Trav., p. 278.

STURGEON. Anglo-F. sturion, Lib. Albus, p. 382.

SUBDUE. Cf. Anglo-F. subduz, pp. subdued, Stat. of the Realm, i. 339, an. 1353.

SUBSCRIBE. 'My lettre subscribed with myn owen hande;' Will of Hen. V.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 238.

SUBURB. Prob. (F., = L.) rather than (L.). Cf. Anglo-F. suburbe, Stat. of the Realm, i. 97, an. 1285; Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 25.

SUCCOUR. The spelling of the E. word is prob. taken from that of the Anglo-F. sb. succour, Langtoft's Chron. i. 302, shortened form of succours (spelt soccours), id. 16, rather than from the verb succure, Vie de St. Auban.

SUET. Spelt suet, Book of St. Albans, fol. e 8, l. 21; sewet, id. fol. f. 3, l. 22; sewit, fol. f. 3, back, l. 11. Cf. the Anglo-F. su, sue, suet, Liber Albus, pp. 237, 245; which gives the primitive form.

SUMACH. Anglo-F. symak, Lib. Albus, pp. 224, 230.

SURCEASE. The Anglo-F. sb. sursise occurs in the Laws of Will. I. § 50. The verb is surseer, pres. pl. subj. surseient, surseisent, Stat. of the Realm, i. 49, 52, 300. We find also sursera equated to Lat. supersedere, Laws of Will. I. § 50. A clear example of this word as a sb. is as follows: 'There was now a surcease from war;' Life of Lord Grey (ab. 1575), Camden Soc., p. 3. Cf. 'effectuel to let or to surcease the sayd action;' Stat. Hen. VII. pr. by Caxton, fol. e 5 (wrongly marked d 5).

SURGEON. Cf. Anglo-F. cyrogen, sirogen, surigien, surrigien, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 104, 158.

SURGERY. I find, however, one instance of the form surgenrie (= surgeon-ry) in P. Plowman, B. xvi. 106 (various reading in two MSS.). This shows that such a form as surgeon-ry was known.

SURROUND. to encompass. (F., = L.) The history of this word is very remarkable. The orig. sense was 'to overflow'; but, by confusion with E. round (with which it has no etymological connection), it took up the sense 'to encompass'; and this unoriginal sense is the only one which can now be attached to it. Etymologically, it should be spelt sur-ound, but the spelling with a double r was usual from the first, even before it was confused with round. Examples of the word, taken from those collected for the Phil. Soc. Dictionary, are given at p. xvi of the Phil. Soc. Proceedings for 1883. Confusion with round came in about A. D. 1620; but the first famous author who uses it in the modern sense is Milton; see P. L. i. 346, ii. 796, iii. 46; Comus, 403; Ode on Nativ. 109 (but in this passage something of the old sense still lingers); Ps. v. 39; Ps. vii. 26. The word does not occur in Shakespeare, in the A. V. of the Bible, or in the P. Book. The true old use of the word appears in Warner, Albion's England, viii. xli. 45 (as published in Chalmers' English Poets, vol. iv), where we read: 'As streams, if stopt, surround,' i. e. overflow. Cotgrave has: 'Oultre couler, to surround, or overflow;' and Minsheu has the entry: 'SURROUND, vide to OUERFLOW.' Sherwood's Index to Cotgrave has: 'Surround, or overflow, oultre couler.' Perhaps it first occurs (rightly spelt with one r) in the following: 'by thencrese of waters dyuers londes and tenementes in grete quantite ben surrounded and destroyed;' Stat. of Hen. VII. (1489), pr. by Caxton, fol. c 7. We find also the Anglo-F. surounder, to overflow, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 324; Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 331; and see La Vie de St. Auban. = O. F. suronder, to overflow (Burguy). = Low Lat. superundare, to overflow, equivalent to classical Lat. exundare. = Lat. super, over; unda, a wave. See ABOUND, UNDULATE; and cf. REDOUND.

SURVEY. Anglo-F. surveer, Stat. of the Realm, i. 285 (1340); surveier, Lib. Albus, p. 512. Burguy gives O. F. sorvoir. Cf. also Anglo-F. surveour, a surveyor, Stat. Realm, i. 289 (1340); whence M. E. surveior, A. D. 1420, Early E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 54, l. 13.

SWARM. The A. S. swearm is authorised. 'Examen apium, swarm;' Mone, Quellen, p. 374.

SYCOPHANT. See Liddell and Scott, Gk. Dict. ed. 1883.

SYMPHONY. The F. form has been accidentally omitted in l. 4. After 'Luke xv. 25,' insert: = F. symphonie, 'harmony,' Cotgrave.

TACHE (1). Cf. Anglo-F. taches, pl., pegs, Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 53. Walloon tachette, a nail for shoes (Sigart).

TAILOR. Anglo-F. tailour, Stat. of the Realm, i. 312, an. 1351.

TAINT. M. E. taint, taynt, a disease in hawks; Book of St. Albans, fol. b 2, back.

TAKE. It may be observed that M. E. taken occurs both in Layamon, l. 23688, and in the Ormulum, l. 85; perhaps the earliest example is tacen, infin., in the A. S. Chron. an. 1127; ed. Earle, p. 256.

TALK. I believe the explanation given at p. 622 is correct; we may note that Russ. tolkavate means not merely 'to interpret,' but also 'to talk about,' just as in English; and tolk' means not only 'sense, interpretation,' but also 'rumour, report;' Reiff. The usual explanation is that tal-k is an extension of tale, the k being added as in smir-k. Those who prefer this explanation can do so; for myself, I utterly reject it. Such a verb would rather have made tel-k, from the verb tell.

TALON. The talon must have meant not merely the hinder claw of a bird, but the hinder claw together with the toe, taking 'claw' in the widest sense. Hawks strike with the hinder claw in pouncing; they then grip with the other claws, so as to hold firmly. See an excellent note by Dr. Chance in N. and Q. 6 S. vi. 90. The fact is that 'talon' and 'pounce' were hawking terms; the former was technically restricted to the hinder claw, the others being called 'pounces.' [Such terms were used in a very fanciful manner; it was not permitted (by some hawkers) to talk of hawks' feathers. They had no feathers at all, only plumes!] In the Book of St. Albans, fol. a 8, we read that 'the grete clees [claws] behynde, . . . ye shall call hom [them] Talons;' and, 'The clees with-in the fote ye shall call . . . Pounces.' From the latter term is derived the verb to pounce; but, the sb. pounce becoming obsolete, only the term talon was left, which had to be applied to all the claws alike.

TAMPER. Cf. 'For often hee hath bene tempering with me;' Harman's Caveat, p. 70.

TANK. In Wilson's Glossary of Indian Terms, p. 508, we find Marathi tanken, Guzerathi tanki, a reservoir of water, commonly known to Europeans in India as a tank. Wilson remarks that the word is said to be Guzerathi. But it may very well be Portuguese, as already shewn.

TANTAMOUNT. Anglo-F. tant amunte, is tantamount to, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 31; tant amount, id. ii. 335. Thus amount is a verb, as already said at p. 624.

TAPER (2). The A. S. taper-ax has nothing to do with mod. E. taper. The Icel. tapar-öx, which is supposed by Vigfusson to have been borrowed from English, is really of Slavonic origin; cf. Russ. topor, an axe.

TAR. Also A. S. taru, tearo, tara; see A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 408.

TAR (2), a sailor; in Swift's Poems, To the Earl of Peterborow, st. 11. It is simply short for TARPAULING, q. v.

TARE (2). Tare and trete [tret] are both mentioned in Arnold's Chron. (1502), ed. 1811, pp. 128, 237.

TASSEL. In an A. S. glossary of the 8th century we actually find the entry: 'Tessera, tasul;' Wright's Vocab. ii. 122. Here tasul must have been taken directly from the Lat. taxillus, and the entry is particularly interesting as shewing that tasul was used in the sense of 'die,' which corroborates the derivation already given.

TATTOO. 'Sir Jas. Turner, in his Pallas Armata (a treatise on military affairs, c. 1627), gives it as tapto, and explains it as the signal for closing the sutlers' canteens;' N. and Q. 3 S. vii. 374; q. v. This is a very early example.

TAUNT. The following quotation is remarkable. 'Geuyng vnto the same taunt pour taunte, or one for another;' Udall, tr. of Erasmus' Apophthegms, Diogenes, § 68. It suggests a possible origin of E. taunt, sb., from F. tant, so much; from Lat. tantus. Further light is desired; on the whole, I think the etymology already given at p. 627 is more likely.

TEA. On the introduction of tea, see D'Israeli, Curiosities of Literature, vol. ii. 319 (Warne's ed.). He remarks that 'the word cha is the Port. term for tea retained to this day, which they borrowed from the Japanese,' &c.

TEDIOUS. The sb. tedeusnes occurs in the Monk of Evesham, ab. 1482, c. 33; ed. Arber, p. 76.

TEETOTUM. Strutt, I find, says precisely the same thing. 'When I was a boy, the te-totum had only four sides, each of them marked with a letter; a T for Take all; an H for Half, i. e. of the stake; an N for Nothing; and a P for Put down, i. e. a stake equal to that you put down at first. Toys of this kind are now made with many sides and letters.' Sports and Pastimes, b. iv. c. 4. § 6. Strutt was born in 1749.

TEMPLE (2). The Lat. tempora, the temples, corresponds to Gk. ῥὰ καίρια, vital parts, parts where a wound is mortal; see Lewis and Short. Hence tempora is merely the pl. of tempus, time.

TENNY, the colour of orange, in heraldry. (F., = C.) Also spelt tenney, tawney; see Boutell's Heraldry. The same word as Tawny, q. v.

TERCEL. The Anglo-F. has tercel (Lib. Custumarium, p. 305) as well as tercelet, Stat. of the Realm, i. 369, an. 1361.

THEODOLITE. We cannot rest satisfied with the guesses hitherto given as to the origin of this word. Investigation shews that the name was originally given to a circle with a broad rim, graduated with great care. This circle was originally used, for surveying, without a telescope; it had merely a revolving index or pointer called an alhidada. Hence, it is simply impossible that the Gk. θεόδοιμος, I see, had any part in its name; nor were our ancestors so ignorant of Gk. as to make up impossible compounds, as is sometimes now done. A Greek verb cannot be thus used to form a compound; and even if it could, θεο- would not intelligently represent the verb θεόδοιμος. Hopton, in his Topographical Glasse (1611), defines Theodelitus (always then so spelt) as 'an instrument consisting of a planisphere and an alhidada'; see N. and Q. 3 S. iv. 51. Earlier, in a book called Pantometria, by T. Digges, first printed in 1571, chap. 27 of book i. is headed: 'The composition of the instrument called Theodelitus;' and it begins: 'It is but a circle divided in 360 grades or degrees, or a semi-circle parted in 180 portions, and every of those divisions in three or rather six smaller partes.' Prof. Adams informs me that the method of subdividing the degrees of the circle was known to the Greeks, and that it is well explained in Rathborne's Surveying (1616), where he says: 'First, the Planisphere or Circle, whose limb is divided into 360 equal parts or divisions called degrees, without [outside] which it is fitting equidistantly to draw and describe six concentric lines or circles with crosse Diagonals, by whose intersections are had the parts of a degree.' This method of division by diagonal lines may be seen on almost any well-marked six-inch rule. Bearing in mind that the name arose among English writers, and that it denoted a circle with a broad rim crossed with such numerous slanting strokes as to give it the appearance of being defaced, Prof. Adams suggests that Theodelitus really stands for 'The O delitus,' i.e. 'the circle effaced.' We find delitus as well as deletus used as the pp. of delere; or it may be the pp. of delinere. It seems to me that this is worth considering, and I record the suggestion in case something may turn up to verify it. In any case, we really must not invoke θεόδοιμος any more.

THOLE (1). I have omitted to give the real Swed. word for thole, viz. tulle.

THRUSH (2). Mentioned in Pepys' Diary, May 13, 1668.

THURSDAY. The following gloss is interesting. 'Joppiter, þunor, oððe [or] þur;' Wright's Voc. ii. 47, col. 1.

THWAITE, a clearing. (Scand.) Common in place-names, in Cumberland, as in Esthwaite, Legberthwaite, &c.; see Taylor's Words and Places, c. 8; Gent. Mag. Nov. 1856, p. 530. In N. and Q. 3 S. x. 68, an example of thwayt is given, as occurring in the 16th century. — Icel. þveit, a paddock, &c., orig. a 'cutting,' i.e. a clearing in a wood. — Icel. *þvita, not found, but the same word as A.S. þwitan, to cut; for which see Whittle (1). Cf. Norw. tveit, a cut, also a small clear space (Aasen); prov. Sw. tveit, a chip, -tveita, a suffix in place-names (Rietz).

TIER. We find: 'vij. or viij. sutche terrible tyres of batterie,' i.e. rounds of shot; Diace of Lord Grey (ab. 1575), p. 20 (C. S. 1847).

TIEF (1), to deck, dress out. (F., — O. Low G.) M. E. tiffen; Will. of Palerne, l. 1725; tiffung, finery, Ancren Riwle, p. 420, note a. — O. F. tiffer, tifer (more commonly attiffer, attiffer), 'to deck, prance, trick, trim, adorn;' Cot. Of Low G. origin; cf. Du. tippen, to cut, clip (lit. to cut off the tip of the hair, to trim); Low G. tippen, to touch lightly, as with the tips of the fingers. These verbs are from Du. tip, Low G. tipp, sb. a tip. See Tip. Cf. prov. E. tippy, smart, fine (Brockett, Halliwell). So also Swed. tippa, to touch gently, from tipp, sb. See F. attiffer in Scheler.

TIEF (2), a pet, fit of ill humour; also, liquor, drink. (Scand.) 'My lord and I have had another little—tiff, shall I call it? it came not up to a quarrel;' Richardson, Grandison, iv. 291 (1754, ed. 1812). Spelt tift in Jamieson and Brockett. 'Small acid tiff;' J. Phillips, The Splendid Shilling; where it means 'drink.' Spelt tiffe in Brome, To his University Friend, 1661, where it means 'thin small beer' (Halliwell, Richardson). The orig. sense is 'a sniff'; hence (1) an expression of indignation; (2) a sup or draught of beer (see Halliwell), or the beer itself. — Norweg. tev, a drawing in of the breath, scent, smell, esp. a bad smell; teva, to puff, sniff, smell; Swed. dial. täv, smell, scent, taste; Icel. þefr, a smell, þefa, to sniff. Hence tiff really stands for thiff, the old Scand. th being turned into t, as in tight.

β. This etymology is at once verified by the Norweg. derivatives teft, sb. a scent, and tefta, verb, to scent, which explain the North. E. tift. Wedgwood well remarks: 'a tiff or fit of ill humour must be explained from snuffing or sniffing the air.'

TIFFIN, luncheon. (Scand.) An Anglo-Indian word, but originally provincial English. Wedgwood says it 'is the North-country tiffing (properly sipping), eating or drinking out of due season.—Grose.' I cannot find it in Grose (ed. 1790), but the Lowland-Scotch has the verb tift, to quaff, from the sb. tift, a drink; corresponding to which we should have prov. E. tiff, to quaff; whence the sb. tiffin = tiffing, a quaffing, a drinking. See Tiff (2).

TINY. The phrase 'littell tine child,' also 'littell tyne child' occurs in a Coventry pageant, printed by Sharp; note to Cov. Myst. ed. Halliwell, p. 414. We may note that the M. E. teone or tene, vexation, is spelt tyene in the Ayenbite of Inwyt, p. 31. Also that tene, actually occurs as an adjective, with the sense 'angry' or 'vexed,' in G. Douglas, tr. of Virgil, Prol. to Bk. viii. st. 14: 'Than wolx I tene at I tuk to sic trufis tent,' then I grew angry because I had paid heed to such trifles.

TIPPLE. The explanation given is wrong; the word rests upon tip (1), not upon tip (2). The Norweg. tipla means both 'to tipple,' and 'to drip'; and is the frequentative of Norw. tippa, to drip. The orig. sense of tippa was, I suppose, to run from a tip, i.e. from the teat of a cow, &c.; cf. Norw. tipp, a tip, O. Du. tipken, a little tip, a teat. So also Bavarian zipfeln, zipfelen, to eat or drink in small quantities, to give small quantities of milk (said of a cow), from zipfel, dimin. of zipf, a tip; Schmeller, col. 1144. Wedgwood points out this connection with G. zipfel, which is certainly right, but explains it somewhat differently, citing zipfelen, a small portion of anything, zipfelweis, in small portions, from zipfel, the tip or narrow end of anything. It does not make any very great difference.

TOIL (1). Cf. Anglo-F. toelle, torment, Langtoft's Chron. ii. 444.

TOMTOM, a kind of drum. (Bengali.) From Bengali tantan, vulgarly tom-tom, a small drum, esp. one beaten to bespeak notice to a public proclamation; laxly applied to any kind of drum; H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 509.

STONE. M. E. ton, Reliq. Antiq. i. 292, l. 6.

TOPSYTURVY. This (practically unsolved) word still occasions much difficulty. It is not certain, as said at p. 650, that -sy- stands for side, since the form topsy tervie in Roy (1528) appears to be older than any quotation in which side appears; so that side may have been purposely substituted for sy. The case of upside down is analogous, in which side is a mere substitution for -sy or -se, i.e. so. Similarly it may be the case that topside was a mere substitution for topsy, i.e. top so. See F. Hall, On Eng. Adjectives in -able, pp. 14–16, 175, and 17–19, 177. As for -turvy, it is, perhaps, worth comparing A.S. torfian, to throw, cast, pelt, Mk. xii. 41. Jo. viii. 59, ðatorfian, to toss, Mat. xiv. 24; M. E. torvien, tarvien, to throw, Layamon, 16703. Ettmüller supposes A.S. torfian and E. turf to be from the same root. Still closer to -turvy is the curious M. E. verb terven, which seems to mean 'to fall down,' and to be related to torfian. It occurs in the Legends of the Holy Rood, p. 207, l. 311, where we find: 'Truyt and treget to helle schal terve,' i.e. wrong and sin shall fall down to hell. Palsgrave has topsy tyrvy, p. 843.

TOTTER. The line quoted from Clare occurs in his Rural Evening, l. 20. Cf. 'The toltering [jolting] bustle of a blundering trot;' Clare, Rural Morning, l. 37.

TOUCH. The curious Anglo-F. form toukier, to touch, occurs in the Vows of the Heron; Polit. Poems, ed. Wright, p. 11, l. 10. This comes very near to the O. Du. tucken.

TRAILBASTON. The passages alluded to at p. 654 prove that trailbastons was the name given to a particular set of lawless men, and that they were so called because they carried (or trailed) sticks, and committed acts of violence. The articles of trailbaston were directed against them, and the justices of trailbaston tried them. The Outlaw's Song (Polit. Songs, p. 231) is explicit; he complains that the articles of trailbaston are unreasonable; for, if he merely chastises his servant with a buffet or two, the servant will have him arrested and he will be heavily fined. Mr. Wright notes that some have supposed (quite wrongly) that the name was given to the judges (not to the outlaws).

TRAM. The reader should notice how completely the 'Outram' theory is disproved by the chronology. It is worth adding that the word is of considerable antiquity. In Christ's Kirk on the Green, attributed to James V., st. 20, we find barrow-trammis, i.e. handles of a wheel-barrow. The same word occurs in Sir D. Lyndsay, Justing betuix Watson and Barbour, l. 33; and the singular barrow-tram occurs still earlier in Dunbar, as cited by Jamieson.

TRANSOM. The following is a very early and important example, shewing whence Skinner obtained the notion of equating it to transtrum. Cooper's Thesaurus, ed. 1565, has: 'Transtra, Seates whereon rowers sit in shippes, boates, or galeis: also a transome goyng ouerthwart an house, Vitruvius.' The etymology of transtrum which I cite is that given by Vaniček, who compares tra-mes, a cross-path, side-path. *Tra-*ns contains the same verbal root as that which occurs in en-ter, Lat. in-tra-re; so that there is no difficulty in deriving a sb. from it. The sb. entrance proves this.

TRAPEZIUM. It occurs in M. Blundeville's Exercises, 1594, fol. 36 b (wrongly marked 39 b).

TREBLE. Reginald atte Pette, in 1456, bequeathed 6s. 8d.

towards the making of a new bell called trebyll; Testamenta Vetusta, ed. Nicolas, p. 286.

TRELLIS. The Lat. trichila may be from the same source as E. tress. See tresse in Scheler.

TRICK (1). The assumed loss of initial s is proved also by the occurrence of A. S. trica and strica, both in the same sense of mark or stroke. 'Caracteres, trican, mærcunge;' Mone, Quellen, p. 388. 'An strica,' i. e. one stroke. Judges, xv (at end).

TRICKLE. Yet another instance. 'Teres trekyl downe be my face;' Cov. Myst. p. 72.

TRIGGER. Spelt tricker in Farquhar, Recruiting Officer, i. 1 (1706).

TRIPOS. Cf. 'Wits, . . . who never, certainly, were at all inspired from a Tripus's, Terræ-filius's, or Prævaricator's speech;' Eng. Garner, vii. 267 (1670). Note that tripos is bad spelling for tripus (i. e. ῥῑῖῑῑῑῑ).

TRIVET. Cf. Anglo-F. trepez, pl. (= trepets), trivets, Havelok, l. 1017.

TRON. Anglo-F. trone, Lib. Custumarum, p. 63; Lib. Albus, p. 246; whence tronage, Lib. Albus, pp. 226, 245.

TROY-WEIGHT. The following early example occurs A. D. 1438. 'Euery cuppe weyng a mark and a half of Troye;' The Fifty Earliest English Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 111, l. 10. In the Will of Card. Beaufort, we find the expression 'de pondere Troiano'; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 326. This clearly points to a place-name as the origin of the word.

TRUCE. The word even found its way into Anglo-French; the sing. trewe occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 300, an. 1344; the pl. appears as trues, trives, trives, in Gaimar's Chron. ll. 567, 3042, 3046. So also, in the French Chron. of London (Camd. Soc.) we have le trueue, p. 46, and les trueues, p. 92. 'A true or peas' occurs as late as in Fabyan, ed. Ellis, p. 401, l. 4; but on p. 318 it is spelt treweue, and, on p. 625, trewe. The F. trève, O. F. trive, is (similarly) from O. H. G. triwa, truth, faithfulness.

TRUNK. The application of this word to the elephant's proboscis arose from a mistake. The F. name for it was trompe (see Cotgrave); which should have been adopted into English in the form trump. But owing to a confusion of sound, and want of clearness as to sense, the word trunk, with the notion of (hollow) stem, and hence 'tube,' was confused with trump, a trumpet, a tube. Thus Halliwell gives trunk and trump both with the sense of 'tube of a pea-shooter,' and he further notes that trunk is sometimes corruptly used in the sense of a trump at cards.

TRYST. Cf. also M. E. tristre, a station in hunting, appointed place, Ancren Riwle, p. 332; allied to trist, trust, tristen, to trust. We still speak of 'a place of trust'; and the tristre was prob. so named because a trusty hunter was placed there. In Gawain and the Grene Knight, we find tryst, v., to trust, l. 380; and tryster, a hunting-station, l. 1712.

TUNE. Anglo-F. tun, tone, voice, Life of Edw. Conf. p. 18, l. 15. 'A tune, tonus, modulus;' Cath. Angl.

TURK. M. Pavet de Courteille, in his Dict. Turk-Oriental (or Tatar Dictionary), which has explanations in French, gives 'turk, brave, rude;' p. 213.

TURN. We even find A. S. tyrnan, so that the word was (at first) introduced directly from Latin. 'Rotunditate, tyrninge;' Mone, Quellen, p. 342. 'Vertigo, tyrning,' id. 345. 'Rotantis, turniendre,' id. 345. But the M. E. tornen is French.

TURNPIKE. It occurs early. Jamieson cites turn-fyk from Wyntoun, viii. xxxviii. 74. In Boutell's Heraldry, figures no. 266 and 267 well illustrate the difference between a turnpike and a turnstile; in particular, the former shews the reason for the name turnpike, inasmuch as its three horizontal bars resembled pikes, and terminated at one end in sharp points.

TURBENTINE. M. E. turbentine, Mandeville's Trav. p. 51.

TURTLE (2). So also, in An Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 121, we find that the islands called in Spanish Tortugas were called in English Tortles, 'because of the number of them which there do breed.' See also vii. 355, 357. For the Span. tortuga, see Tortoise.

TUSK. The M. E. tusk occurs in the Cath. Anglicum, and in St. Juliana, p. 68, l. 13. It was prob. a Northern form, tusch or tush being Southern.

TUSSELE. Cf. 'to towsill me,' i. e. to pull me about; Rauf Coilyear, l. 434 (ab. 1475).

TWELVE. Another explanation of the suffix -lif in Goth. twalif is given under Eleven (in the second edition).

UHLAN, ULAN. The word is certainly pure Turkish, and of Tatar origin. The Turk. is oglan, oglan (vulgarly ölan), a son, youth, lad, servant; Zenker's Dict. p. 124. Cf. also ogul, ogúl, a son, child. The Tatar word is oglan, a son, child; which was formerly in use, among the Moguls, as a title of princes of the blood royal; Pavet de Courteille, Dict. Turk-Oriental, p. 63. Cf. also Tatar ogúl, son.

ULLAGE. 'Onofrier, in his Glossaire Lyonnais, commenting on the verb olier, ouiller, to fill to the brim, observes that in the South of France, when a flask is nearly full, they add a little oil instead of a cork to prevent evaporation, so that to oil a flask is equivalent to filling it to the brim. In Provence oliar signifies to anoint with oil, and also to fill up a cask.'—Wedgwood. And, in fact, we find in Cotgrave the following: 'oïillage de vins, the filling up of leaky wine-vessels; oïller les vins, to fill up wine-vessels which have leaked.'

UNANELED. 'I aneale a sicke man, I anoynte hym with holy oyle, Ienhuyll. I lefte hym so farre past, that he was houseled and aneeled;' Palsgrave. The word anele was also spelt anoi, by substitution of the F. form oil for the older A. S. form. See two examples in Davies, Supp. Glossary.

UNCLE. Anglo-F. uncle, Gaimar's Chron. l. 188; Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 181.

UNION (2). Anglo-F. union, described by Philip de Thauin, Bestiary, 1482. M. E. uniune, Land of Cokayne, l. 89.

UNIVERSITY. Anglo-F. universite, Year-Books of Edw. I. iii. 429.

UNLESS. Cf. 'But men of levyng be so owtrage, . . . That, lesse than synne the soner swage, God wyl be vengyd,' &c. I. e. on a less supposition than the supposition that men mend their ways, &c.; Coventry Mysteries, p. 40. This shews the idea involved. Here lesse than is short for on lesse than; and the modern unless that = on less than that.

UNRULY. In the Cath. Angl. (1483), we find: 'Reuly, tranquillus,' and 'vn-rewely, inquietus.' Also 'reule, regula;' and 'to reule, regulate.' The sense 'tranquil' may have been due to confusion with M. E. ro, rest; but the form of the word is due to 'reule, regula.' We find 'ruly and rightwise,' in the Destruction of Troy, l. 3888, where the sense seems to be 'orderly.' Cotgrave explains F. modéré by 'moderate, quiet, ruly, temperate, orderly.'

UPSTART. Cf. also start-up, Much Ado, i. 3. 69.

URCHIN. See note on Formidable (p. 806).

USE (2), profit, benefit. (F., = L.) When use is employed, in legal documents, in the special sense of 'benefit,' it is a modernised spelling of the Anglo-F. form of the Lat. opus, employment, need. Cf. Anglo-F. oes, use, profit, Annals of Burton, pp. 474, 482, A. D. 1258; oeps, Liber Custumarum, p. 202; Statutes of the Realm, i. 144, A. D. 1299; uoos, service, Vie de St. Auban, 1554. A good example is the following: 'Que il feist a sun oes guarder,' which he caused to be kept for his own use; Roman de Rou, 2336. ¶ We find also Anglo-F. us, usage, use (from Lat. acc. usum), Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 409. See oes, ues, eus, obs, in Bartsch.

USHER. Anglo-F. usser, Gaimar's Chron. ll. 5982, 5995, 5999; spelt ussker, Lib. Custumarum, p. 475. The pl. Aus, doors, occurs in Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 23.

UTAS. Anglo-F. utaves, octaves, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 407; utavs, id. i. 75; oetaves, Stat. of the Realm, i. 310, an. 1351.

UTENSIL. 'Alle þe utensyl of myn hows;' Early E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 18, l. 10 (A. D. 1411).

VAMPIRE. 'Vampir, vampir, währwulf, blutsauger,' i. e. vampire, werewolf, blood-sucker; Popović, Servian Dict. Cf. Russ. vampir, Polish upior, upir.

VANISH. Cf. Anglo-F. evaniz, pp., Life of Edw. Conf. l. 3778.

VANTAGE. Anglo-F. vantage, advantage, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 209.

VENIAL. O. F. venial (see Littré).

VENTAIL. M. E. ventaile (A. D. 1411); Early E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 19, l. 4; Anglo-F. ventaile, Langtoft, ii. 428.

VENUE. Anglo-F. venue, resort, Stat. of the Realm, i. 26, an. 1275; venue des justices, venue of the justices, id. i. 211, an. 1286.

VERANDA. 'The other gate leads to what in this country [India] is called a veranda or feranda, which is a kind of piazza or landing-place before you enter the hall or inner apartments,' Archaeologia, viii. 254 (1787). A very early instance; in Davies, Supp. Glossary.

VERB. M. E. verbe (15th cent.), Reliq. Antiq. i. 14.

VERDICT. The Anglo-F. pl. veirdiz (from sing. veirdit) occurs in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 212 (ab. 1286).

VERGE (1). Anglo-F. verge, a limit, Stat. of the Realm, i. 138, an. 1300.

VERIFY. Spelt veryfyfe, Cov. Myst. p. 122.

VETCH. Walloon veche (Sigart).

VETERAN. Spelt veterane in Holinshed (or rather Stanihurst),^φ Descr. of Ireland (1586), repr. 1808, vi. 226.

VIEW. We find the actual spelling view in Anglo-F., in Lib. Albus, p. 182; also veue, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 67, 73; vue, Life of Edw. Conf. i. 2784.

VINTAGE. Anglo-F. vendenge, Stat. of the Realm, i. 331, an. 1353.

VINTNER. Anglo-F. vineter (as a proper name), Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 301; M. E. vinter, A.D. 1435, Early E. Wills, ed. Furnivall, p. 103, l. 7. The mod. E. word certainly ought to have been vinter; whence the word Vintry (i.e. vinter-y) as the name of one of the London wards.

VISCOUNT. Our spelling is due to Anglo-F. visconte, the usual word for 'sheriff', Stat. of the Realm, i. 28, an. 1275; spelt viscunte, Annals of Burton, p. 455; viscounte, Lib. Custumarum, p. 130; viconte, Year-Books of Edw. I. i. 7.

VISCOUS. Spelt viscose, Caxton, tr. of Reynard, c. 32, ed. Arber, p. 90, l. 1.

VISIBLY. The adv. visibely (sic) occurs in Mandeville's Trav. p. 279.

VIXEN. Cf. 'fixen hyd,' put for 'fyxen hýd,' i.e. fox's hide; A. S. Leechdoms, i. 342.

VOICE. We find the spelling voice in Anglo-F., in Langtoft's Chron. i. 260; usually voiz, as in Life of Edw. Conf. i. 1487.

WAFFER. Anglo-F. wafre, Lib. Custumarum, p. 473.

WAGE, WAGES. Anglo-F. wage, a prize, Langtoft's Chron. i. 222; pl. wages, wages, French Chron. of London, p. 83; gages, wages, Stat. of the Realm, i. 137, an. 1300.

WAIF. Anglo-F. waif, lib. Custumarum, pp. 434, 486, 151; in the Life of Edw. Conf. i. 3204, waif signifies 'a man who has strayed.'

WAINSCOT. The earliest example of the use of the word is in the Liber Albus, p. 238, where it is spelt weynscotte. In a number of Taalstudie, 1883, p. 65, kindly sent me from Amsterdam, there is an elaborate article (in English) on this word by J. B. Vinckers, of Kampen, dated Oct. 7, 1882. The author proves, carefully and conclusively, that the derivation which I have given (from Du. wagen) is practically wrong, and that the derivation (from Du. weeg), which I have rejected, is really the true one. The whole argument turns upon the fact (hitherto unknown to me) that the Du. form wagenschot is an accommodated one, due to a popular etymology which misunderstood a word of which the former half had become obsolete. The E. wainscot is borrowed, as shewn, from Du. wagenschot, in which wagen seemed to mean 'waggon'; but, as a fact, the n has been inserted, and the true old form was waeghe-schot; both of these forms are given by Kilian. But waeghe is from O. Du. waeg, another form of weeg, a wall; see Ten Kate, Aenleiding, ii. 507. Ten Kate not only gives waeg-luis, weeg-luis, a bug, lit. 'wall-louse,' but distinctly points out the origin of the Du. wageschot (as he spells the word). 'Dutch shipwrights (says Herr Vinckers) still use a very remarkable term wageren, meaning "to cover the inside of a ship with boards," from which is derived the pl. noun wageringen, the inside boards, i.e. exactly the wand-schot or wagen-schot of a ship.' He further instances the parallel term seen in A. S. wah-piling, lit. 'wall-planking.' Hence the etymology must be amended accordingly. The Du. wagenschot is a substitution for O. Du. wageschot or rather waegheschot, from O. Du. waeg, a wall, and schot, a wooden covering, panelling of boards. β. The O. Du. waeg is closely related to A. S. wah, a (wooden) wall, also written wag, wæg (gen. wages), and Icel. vegg, a wall, whence vegg-pili, wainscoting. These words are connected by Fick with √WA, to bind; iii. 302. To the same root we may refer E. wattle and Goth. waddjus, a wall, orig. wattled work. γ. The above etymology is proved by the existence of a parallel O. Du. form wandschot, from wand, a wall; and it is remarkable that this wand is derived from wand (mod. Du. wond), pt. t. of winden, to wind; from the same notion of wattled work. δ. The whole difficulty arises from the insertion of an unoriginal n, which can be accounted for only as being due to popular etymology, and in no other way. Disguised words of this character are extremely deceptive.

WAIT. Anglo-F. wayter, to watch, Langtoft's Chron. i. 448; spelt guaiter, Laws of Will. I. § 28. We find also wayte, sb., a watchman, Lib. Albus, p. 646; spelt gayte, p. 647.

WAIVE. Anglo-F. weyver, weiver; the pt. t. weyva occurs in the Year-Books of Edw. I., i. 205, and the pp. weive in the same, p. 55. The outlawry of a female is called weyverie, Lib. Albus, p. 190.

WAKE (2). So also Low G. wake, a hole in ice; Bremen Wörterbuch.

WALLET. It may be noted that the change from watel to wallet is analogous to the very common change of M. E. world into the curious form wordle, as in P. Plowman, C. i. 10 (footnote), xxi. 136

(footnote), B. xx. 379 (footnote); &c. So too, in Old Plays, ed. Hazlitt, vi. 77, we have fadoch for faggot.

WANION. I have since found that the expression in the waniand is much older than the time of More; for Minot writes: 'It was in the waniand [i.e. in an unlucky hour] that thai come there;' Polit. Poems, ed. Wright, i. 87. Cf. 'when the mone is wanande;' Reliq. Antiq. i. 52. 'Ealle eorðlice lichaman beoð fulran on weaxendum mōnan þonne on wanigendum;' all earthly bodies are fuller in the waxing than in the waning moon; Pop. Treatises on Science, ed. T. Wright, p. 15. And again, in the York Mysteries, p. 319, Pilate says: 'Nowe walkis in the wanyand, and wende youre way wightly.'

WARDEN. Anglo-F. wardein, Gaimar's Chron. i. 5443; Lib. Albus, p. 247.

WARE (1). An early example of M. E. ware is in Layamon, l. 11356. The reference in Bosworth should have been given to § 3 (not § 1) of the Council of Enham, where the acc. scrūd-ware occurs, meaning lit. 'shroud-ware,' hence monastic raiment. See Thorpe, Anc. Laws, i. 314.

WARRANT. In the Laws of Will. I., we also find the spellings warant, warrant, §§ 45, 47. Cf. also Anglo-F. warrantie, warranty, Year-Books of Edw. I. ii. 331, spelt garrantie, id. i. 11.

WAYWARD. Compare also: 'His weyes were a-wayward, wrothliche wrou't;' Reliq. Antiq. ii. 9; 'Somme [notes of music] kroken a-wayward, als a fleshoke;' id. i. 292. Also a-wayward = Lat. auersus, Trevisa, ii. 25.

WEDLOCK. I am told that the suffix -lác in wed-lác is merely the common suffix of abstract substantives. Cf. Icel. -leikr, Swed. -lek, suffixes used to form abstract sbs., and cognate with A. S. -lác. Still, the orig. sense of lác was 'present.' We find wedlác used to explain Lat. arrabo, as already noted; also as equivalent to Lat. sponsalia (Leo). In Layamon and the Ormulum, wedlac means 'matrimony.'

WEE. We actually find the spelling wea-bit for way-bit; and it was, further, actually turned into wee-bit. I think this clinches the etymology. 'In the North parts . . there is a wea-bit to every mile;' Howell, Famil. Letters, iv. 28. It is used also metaphorically. 'I have heard him prefer divers, and very seriously, before himself, who came short a mile and a way-bit;' Hacket, Life of Williams, i. 59. 'General Leslie, with his Scottish, ran away more than a Yorkshire mile and a Wee bit;' Fuller, Worthies, Yorkshire (ii. 494). These extracts are from Davies, Supp. Glossary.

WHARF. Earlier examples occur in the Lib. Custumarum, where we find wherf, p. 62, and wodehwarfe, wood-wharf, p. 150. Also warf, Will of Hen. VI.; Royal Wills, ed. Nichols, p. 298.

WHELK (1). The pl. welkes occurs in the Lib. Custumarum, p. 407, l. 9, and in the Lib. Albus, pp. 179, 244, 245, 275, 377, 381, 689. (Never spelt whelkes.)

WHERRY. Spelt whirry, Latimer, Seven Sermons, ed. Arber, p. 170; wherry, Drayton, Seventh Nymphal (Lelipa). 'A whery, cymbe;' Introd. to Speke French, in appendix to Palsgrave (ed. 1852), p. 916, col. 3 (ab. 1530).

WHIG. It should be noticed that the explanation of whiggamore as 'a great whig' in the Gloss. to Scott's novels is probably a guess; there being no special sense in the epithet 'great.' It clearly arose from dividing the word as whiga-more, whereas (if Burnet be right) it is rather whiggam-or, the suffix being the same as in sail-or and tail-or.

WHISKEY. The Gael. uisge, O. Irish uisce, usce, are allied to E. water, from √WAD. See Curtius, i. 308; Fick, i. 766.

WHIST. The game of cards is called whisk by Taylor the Water-poet, who is said to be the earliest writer to mention it. Nares refers to his Works, ed. 1630; Halliwell to Taylor's Motto, 1622, sig. d 4 (it occurs in Taylor's Works, ed. 1630, p. 54, col. 2). But it makes no difference to the etymology, since whisk is quite as fit a form as whist for enjoying silence, and indeed agrees more closely with the Swed. hviska, Dan. hviske, to whisper, Norweg. hviska, to whisper; see WHISPER. Note also prov. E. whister, to whisper; whisk, whist, silent (Halliwell); and see whisk, whisht, whist in Nares. Whisk occurs in Thomson's Autumn (1730), l. 524, and in Pope's second Epistle to Mrs. Blount (1715), l. 24; where modern editions have whist. See the Introduction to 'Cavendish on Whist.'

WHITSUNDAY. The W. name sulgwyn, Whitsuntide, is, literally, 'white sun,' from sul, sun, Sunday, and gwyn, white. This name is old, and a mere translation from the E. name at a time when it was still rightly understood. (But experience shews that no arguments will convince those who prefer guess-work to evidence. The wrong ideas about this word are still persistently cherished.)

WHORL. We also find wherve, of which whirl (= whervel) is the diminutive. Moreover, wharrow is a mere variant of wherve. A spider is said to use 'the weight of her owne bodie instead of a wherve;' Holland, tr. of Pliny, b. xi. c. 24. See other examples in Davies, Supp. Glossary, and in Catholicon Anglicum, note 4.

WIDGEON. Perhaps not (F., -Teut.), but (F., -L.). Spelt wygeon by Sir T. Elyot, Castel of Helth, b. ii. c. 23. Evidently from a variant of F. vigeon, as already said (p. 710). But perhaps F. vigeon is from Lat. uipionem, acc. of uipio, a word used by Pliny, bk. x. c. 49, to mean a kind of small crane. Cf. Ital. vipione, a small crane (Torriano). The laws of letter-change are thus perfectly satisfied, since M. E. widgeon results from Lat. uipionem precisely as E. pigeon does from Lat. pipionem. (Suggested by Mr. H. T. Wharton, who further refers to Salernè, Hist. Nat. des Oiseaux (Paris, 1767), p. 424.)

WINDLASS (2). Wedgwood points out that there is a Low G. windels, a winding, e.g. the winding of a screw or of the ornamental work on a sword-hilt, in the Bremen Wörterbuch. If such a form existed in English, it might easily have become windles, windless, windlass. A fuller investigation of the history of the word, and a discovery of more examples of it, would probably settle the question. Palsgrave has: 'Hewar, that fetteth the wyndelesse in huntynge, hueur.'

WINE. Another theory is that Lat. uinum and Gk. oivos are non-Aryan words, borrowed from Semitic; we find, indeed, Heb. yayin, wine, Arab. waynat, a black grape (Rich. Dict. p. 1660); Ethiopic wein or wain, wine; Gesenius, 8th ed.

WITTOL. The explanation given is as good as proved by the fact that Bp. Hall spells it witwal. 'Fond wit-wal that wouldst load thy wittless head With timely horns, before thy bridal bed;' Sat. i. 7. 17.

WONDER. Another example of 'wonders well' = wondrously well, occurs in Udall, Apophthegms of Erasmus, bk. i. Aristippus, § 28.

WOOLWARD. Cf. the following: 'Assez souvent lessa le linge, Et si frotta le dos au lange,' Rutebuef, ii. 157; cited in Littré, s. v. lange. I.e. 'Very often she left off her linen [chemise], and rubbed her back against her woollen garment.' Le dos au lange is just E. woolward.

WORMWOOD. As to sect. 8, Mr. Palmer points out that Burton, in his Anat. of Melancholy, pt. ii. sec. 4. mem. i. subsec. 3, expressly mentions the use of wormwood in curing madness. So much the better.

WORT (2). The A. S. form occurs. It is not wert, as in Somner, but wyrte. We find max-wyrte (lit. mash-wort), wort, new beer, Cockayne's A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 87, 97, 107; see Mash. This form settles the etymology; for wyrte is clearly from A. S. wyrt, a wort or plant, as already suggested.

WOURALI, OURALI, OORALI, OURARI, CURARI, a resinous substance, extracted from the Strychnos toxifera, used for poisoning arrows, &c. (Guiana). 'The hellish oorali;' Tennyson, In the Children's Hospital, l. 10. And see Waterton's Wanderings. From 'ourali, written also wourali, urali, urari, curare, &c., according to the pronunciation of the various tribes;' W. H. Brett, Indian Tribes of Guiana, 1868, p. 140.

WRECK. In a glossary of E. law-terms, written in the 13th cent., and printed in Reliq. Antiq. i. 33, we find 'Wrec, trauure de mer,' i.e. that which is cast up by the sea. This confirms the etymology already given. We find also wrek in the Stat. of the Realm, i. 28, an. 1275.

WRINKLE (1). Weigand connects G. runzel with Swed. rynka, but disputes the connection with E. wrinkle. If we admit the former relation, we may as well admit the latter.

WRINKLE (2). The word occurs in Lyly, Euphues, ed. Arber, p. 389; and in Latimer, Letter 49, ed. Parker Soc., pp. 421-2.

YACHT. It first occurs (probably) in Evelyn's Diary, Oct. 1, 1661. See Davies, Supp. Glossary.

YAK, the name of an animal. (Thibet.) In a Thibetan Dict., by H. A. Jäschke, p. 668, we are told that the Thibet. word is yyag, a male yak, the female being called po-yyag. The symbol y is used to denote a peculiar Thibetan sound.

YAM. Occurs in 1689; Eng. Garner, vii. 367.

YANKEE. We also find Low G. jakkern, to keep walking about, certainly connected with Du. jagen and jacht. Also Norw. janka, to totter, belonging to the same set of words. I have now little doubt that yankee is connected with these words, and not with English nor with Du. jankin, both obviously guesses, and not good guesses. In his Supplem. Glossary, Davies quotes: 'Proceed in thy story in a direct course, without yawing like a Dutch yanky;' Smollett, Sir L. Greaves, ch. iii. Davies explains yanky as meaning 'a species of ship,' I do not know on what authority. If right, it goes to shew that yanky, in this instance, is much the same as yacht. I conclude that yanky or yankee orig. meant 'quick-moving,' hence, active, smart, spry, &c.; and that it is from the verb yank, to jerk, which is a nasalised form from Du. and G. jagen, to move quickly, chase, hunt, &c., cf. Icel. jaga, to move to and fro, like a door on its hinges, Swed. jaga. Dan. jage, to chase, hunt. The Dan. jage is a strong verb, with pt. t. jog. The verb to yank, meaning 'to jerk,' was carried from the North of England or Scotland to America, where Mr. Buckland heard it used in 1871, and thought 'we ought to introduce it into this country;' quite forgetting whence it came. In his Logbook of a Fisherman and Naturalist, 1876, p. 129, he gives the following verses, 'composed by one Grumbo Cuff.' 'A grasshopper sat on a sweet-potato vine, Sweet-potato vine, Sweet-potato vine, A big wild turkey came running up behin', And yanked the poor grasshopper Off the sweet-potato vine, The sweet-potato vine.'

YATAGHAN, ATAGHAN, a dagger-like sabre, with doubly curved blade. (Turk.) Spelt ataghan in Byron, Giaour; see note 27. Spelt yataghan or ataghan in F. also. - Turk. yâtâghân, a yataghan; see Devic, and Pavet de Courteille, Dict. du Turc Oriental; spelt yâtâghân, yâtâghân. Zenker's Dict. pp. 947, 958.

YEARN (2), l. 7. For Rich. II. v. 7. 56 read Rich. II. v. 5. 76.

YUCCA, a genus of American liliaceous plants. (Caribbean?) 'A root called yucca;' Eng. Garner, ed. Arber, v. 516, l. 1 (1593). The same word as Span. yuca, which in Monlau's Diccionario Etimológico, is said to be a word of Caribbean origin. Mahn says it is the name in the island of Hayti; which comes to the same thing.

ZAMINDAR, ZEMINDAR, a land-holder, occupant of land. (Hind., -Pers.) Hind. zamindâr, vernacularly jamindâr, corruptly zemindâr, an occupant of land, a land-holder; Wilson, Ind. Terms, p. 562. - Pers. zamin, earth, land, soil; dâr, holding, possessing, Rich. Dict. pp. 782, 646. Here Pers. zamin is allied to Lat. humus, ground; and Pers. dâr to Skt. dhri, to hold; see Home-age and Firm.

ZANANA, ZENANA, female apartments. (Hind., -Pers.) Hindustani zanâna, vernacularly janâna, incorrectly zenana, the female apartments; sometimes, the females of a family. - Pers. zanân, women; pl. of zan, a woman. Cognate with Gk. γυνή, a woman, and E. queen. H. H. Wilson, Gloss. of Indian Terms, p. 564; Rich. Dict. p. 783.

ZANY. The Heb. is Yôkhândn, the Lord graciously gave; from khânan, to be gracious, to shew mercy (kh = the letter Heth). See 1 Chron. iii. 15. Yô is put for Yahveh (Jehovah).

ZOUAVE, one of a body of soldiers in the French service, orig. Arabs, but now Frenchmen in Arab dress. (N. African.) Modern; since the conquest of Algeria by the French in 1830; Haydn, Dict. of Dates. - Arab. (N. African) Zouaoua, a tribe of Kabyles living among the Jurjura mountains in Algeria (Mahn, Littré).

LIST OF ALTERATIONS MADE IN THE SECOND EDITION.

[N.B.—The following list does not include typographical improvements, such as the restoration of whole for broken letters and stops, and similar lesser details. Neither does it include a list of the articles to which the marks [†] or [*] are suffixed, with the intention of drawing attention to the Addenda; nor the further alterations given in pp. 775–834 above.]

A-, prefix, l. 20. For abridge, read abate.
Ab-, prefix, l. 3. For abbreviate, read abdicate. Line 4, for Abridge, read Abate.
Abdicate, l. 4. For dicare is an intensive form of dicere, read dicare is from the same root as dicere.
Abide (2), ll. 11 and 17. For abiegan and biegan read abyegan and byegan (such being the better mode of spelling).
About, p. 5, l. 2. Read Similar.
Above. For 'A. S. ufan,' read 'ufan.' So also for abusfan read abusfan. [The u in ufan is short; even in abusfan, put for abi-ufan, it seems to have been shortened.]
Abyss. For (Gk.) read (L., – Gk.)
Accord, l. 6. For cordem, acc. of cor, read cord-, stem of cor.
Ace, l. 1. Read (F., – L., – Gk.) In l. 3, for and thus cognate, read but not cognate. And omit reference to One.
Achieve, l. 3. Dele the mark – after 'accomplish.'
Acorn, ll. 6, 7. Read 'Goth. akran, fruit; cf. the comp. akranalaus.' So in l. 22, read akran.
Acoustic, l. 3. For κοῖν read κοῖν.
Acre, l. 1. Omit the form akre. In l. 5, read ἀγρός.
Ad-, prefix, p. 8, l. 2. After appear, add 'also ar-, as-, at-, as in ar-rest, as-sist, at-test.'
Adjust, last line. For Not to be derived, &c., read But see Errata.
Admiral, l. 13. After dropped, read As to the reason for this supposition, see note in Errata.
Aery, l. 2. For Scand., read Teut.? For section γ, substitute the following. γ. It must be admitted, however, that the word is one of great difficulty; and Littré maintains the contrary opinion, that the F. aire is nothing but the Lat. area, supposed to mean 'a flat place on the surface of a rock, where an eagle builds its nest.' He thinks that its meaning was further extended to imply dwelling, stock, family, race; so that hence was formed the expression de bon aire, which appears in the E. debonair. He would even further extend the sense so as to include that of manner, mien, or air, as in the E. expression 'to give oneself airs.' See Littré, Hist. de la Langue Française, i. 61.
Affray, last line. After adjective, read See, however, corrections in Errata.
Aggregate, ll. 3–5. After aggreggen, read 'which is like the F. agrégér (which see in Brachet), and occurs in Chaucer's Melibeus; but this aggreggen is really distinct from agrégér, and represents O. F. agregier, to aggravate.'
Agnail, ll. 10, 11. Read—A. S. angnægl, a sore by the nail, occurring in A. S. Leechdoms, ii. 81, § 34, but given in Lye's Dictionary without a citation. And, for the last three lines, read—the A. S. ang-nægl, which may, after all, be the true source of both angnail and agnail. The word is one of some difficulty; see remarks in the Errata.
Agog, last line. Dele Cf. G. gucken, to peep. (See the Errata).
Agony, l. 8. For Gr. ἀγών read Gk. ἀγών.
Air. At end, add—For Air (2), see Errata, &c.
Alchemy, p. 15, ll. 5, 6. For χημεία read χημεία.
Alder, l. 12. For Russ. olecha, read Russ. olekha.
Ale, l. 4. For Fick, iii. 57 read Fick, iii. 27.
Alembic. Read (F., – Span., – Arab., – Gk.) In l. 6, for ἀμβίξ read ἀμβίξ.

Algebra, last line. For 'gábar, to make strong,' read 'gábbar, to be strong.'
Allay. For (F., – L.) read (E.); and continue—[The history of this word, as given in the first edition of this work, is here repeated, but requires correction; see the Errata.] The word itself, &c.
Allure. For (F., – G.) read (Hybrid).
Almond, l. 7. Read exrescent. [See Errata.]
Alone, at end. Read Alone is further connected with lonely and lone; see Lone. [See corrections respecting Lone.]
Along, at end. Read—We may also compare Icel. adj. endilangr, whence the adv. endelong, lengthwise, in Chaucer, C. T. 1993.
Also, l. 3. For eal swa, ealswa, read eal swá, ealswá.
Amaranth, l. 4. For ἀμάραντος read ἀμάραντος.
Amazon, at end. Add—Perhaps fabulous. [See Errata.]
Among, near the end. For '– A. S. mengan' read 'Cf. A. S. mengan.' [See Mingle, and remarks thereon.]
Analyse, l. 9. For ἀνα read ἀνά.
Andiron, l. 5. For p. 197 read p. 176.
Anecdote. For ἐκδοτος read ἐκδοτος.
Angle, l. 2. For G. angle read G. angel. In l. 3, for ἀγκων read ἀγκών.
Anise. For (F., – Gk.) read (F., – L., – Gk.)
Ankle, l. 12. For ἀγκων read ἀγκών.
Antartic, l. 1. For (L., – G.) read (L., – Gk.)
Anthropophagi, l. 2. For ἀνθρωποφάγος read ἀνθρωποφάγος.
Antichrist, l. 2. For χρίστος read Χριστός.
Antidote. For (F., – Gk.) read (F., – L., – Gk.)
Aphæresis, l. 3. For ἀπό read ἀπό.
Apocope, l. 3. For ἀποκοπή read ἀποκοπή.
Apotheosis, l. 4. For θεός read θεός.
Apple, l. 7. Read—Russian iabloko, Lithuanian obolys. In l. 19, for suggest read suggests.
Arabesque. For (F., – Ital.) read (F., – Ital., – Arab.)
Arch (2), at end. For This word is closely connected with Arrant read But see another suggestion in the Errata.
Archetype. For (F., – Gk.) read (F., – L., – Gk.)
Are (under ART). Begin the article thus—We find O. Northumbrian arð (Luke, iv. 34); but art answers to A. S. (Wessex) eart. Hence the final -t stands for an older -ð, the contraction of ðé, thou. And (three lines lower), for as-ðu read as-ðú.
Arena, l. 4. For '– Lat. arere, to be dry; see Arid' read 'Better harena; see Errata.'
Argosy. For (Span. (?), – Gk.) read (Dalmatian). In l. 6, for The latter read The former. And § β stands thus:—β. The etymology of this word has been set at rest by Mr. Tancock, in N. and Q. 6 S. iv. 490. See The Present State of the Ottoman Empire, by Sir Paul Ricaut, 1675, c. 14, p. 119; Lewis Roberts's Marchant's Map of Commerce, 1638, c. 237, where he speaks of the great ships 'vulgarly called Argoses, properly Rhaguses;' and especially the earlier quotation about 'Ragusyes, Hulks, Caravels, and other rich laden ships,' in The Petty Navy Royal, by Dr. John Dee, 1577, pr. in An English Garner, ii. 67. See also Wedgwood (Contested Etymologies); Palmer (Folk-Etymology). The O. F. argousin is unrelated; see Palmer, Brachet. Ragusa is a port in Dalmatia, on the E. coast of the Gulf of Venice.
Ark, l. 4. For ἀλαλκεῖν read ἀλαλκεῖν.

- Arms, l. 3. For ἀρμενα read ἀρμενα.
Arouse. For (See Rouse) read (Scand.)
Asbestos, l. 4. For -σβεστος read -σβεστος.
Ask, at the end. After E. wish, read—And this is certainly correct; askja stands for an older form askja, which has lost an initial w or v. See Wish.
Askance, l. 18. For See further under Aslant, read But see the Errata.
Asperity. For (Lat.) read (F., -L.)
Assay. For (F., -L.) read (F., -L., -Gk.)
Assonant. For (F., -L.) read (Lat.)
Assume, l. 8. For subemere read subimere.
Asthma, l. 3. For ἀσθμα read ἀσθμα.
Astonish, l. 9. For which seems to be the earliest instance read the date of which is about 1580.
Astound, l. 4. For as early as in Sir P. Sidney read as early as 1539 (Bible).
Asymptote, l. 4. For ovv read ovv.
Atheism, l. 5. For ā read ā.
Atone, sect. β. 2, l. 10. For 'written in 1553' read 'written in 1513'.
Attach. At end, add—See Tack.
Attire, l. 1. For (E.; with F. prefix) read (F., -L. and G.) In l. 2, for earlier read later (?). In l. 16, read—(Lat. ad); and a sb. tire, a row (cf. Prov. tieira, a row), which is to be considered as quite distinct from the common F. tirer, to draw. B. See further in Errata; I now withdraw my statement that the source of O. F. atirer is the Low G. sb. tir, &c. And again, on p. 42, col. 1, ll. 3-6, for 'This word must have been,' &c. read 'The true source of this O. F. sb. tire is seen in O. H. G. ziari, mod. G. zier, ornament. [The rest of this article I now withdraw; see Errata.] And neglect the latter part of the article.
Autocracy, l. 4. For stem read base.
Ave, l. 1. For usually read mostly.
Avocation, last line. For uoci read uoc.
Avoid, ll. 14, 15. Read—It seems almost incredible that, in some dictionaries, it appears to be connected with the F. éviter.
Avow, last line. Dele—Quite unconnected with avouch. (See Errata.)
Awe, l. 1. For (E.) read (Scand.) In ll. 3-7, for 'The former agrees,' &c., read 'We also meet with A.S. ōga, fear, dread, and A.S. ege, fear. Both words, &c. Both can be referred to a common base AG, to drag.—Icel. agi, &c.
Awry, l. 15. For swa deð read swá deð.
Aye, last line but one. For aláv read aláv.
Azure, last line. Add—So called from the mines of Lajward; see Marco Polo's Travels, ed. Yule.
Bachelor, at end. Read—The usual derivation from W. bach, little is possible; see Errata.
Baffle. For (M.E., -Icel.) read (Scand.)

Heronshaw, l. 10. Read—The etymology of this heronshaw is given by Tyrwhitt, who cites the F. heronshaw from 'the glossary,' meaning probably that in Urry's ed. of Chaucer; but it is verified by the fact, that the O. F. herouncel (older form of heronshaw) occurs in the Liber Custumarum, p. 304, and means 'a young heron.' The suffix -cel is a double dimin., as in lion-c-el, later lionceau. Cf. also M. E. bew-tee = F. beauté. 2. Hernshaw in its other sense; &c. Add at end—Hence heronshaw (1) is (F., = O. H. G.); heronshaw (2) is hybrid.

Litter (3), a brood. (F., = L.) In Shak. Merry Wives, iii. 5. 12. Really the same word as litter (2). In the Prompt. Parv., we have: 'lytere, or strowynge of hors;' and: 'lytere, or forthe brynggynge of beestys.' Cf. F. accoucher, and the phrases 'to be brought to bed,' and 'to be in the straw.'

Livelong, l. 1. Read long as life is.

Load, a quantity carried, a burden. (E.) Most probably this word has been extended in meaning by confusion with the unrelated verb to lade. Load is common in Shakespeare both as a sb. and verb, but in M. E. it is a sb. only, and is identical with Lode, q. v., notwithstanding the difference in sense. The A. S. lād means only way, course, journey; but M. E. lode has also the sense of 'burden.' I can find no earlier example of this use than carte-lode, a cart-load, in Havelok, l. 895. It should be particularly noticed, however, that the derived verb to lead is constantly used in prov. E. in the sense 'to carry corn'; and, in the Prompt. Parv. p. 62, we find: 'Cartyn, or lede wythe a carte, Carruco.' Chaucer has i-lad = carried, Prologue, 530. Hence load = M. E. lode = A. S. lād, a derivative from lāð, pt. t. of the strong verb līðan, to go, travel. See Lode, Lead (1). Der. load, vb.

Real (1), l. 6. For from the O. F. read than the O. F.

Rebate, last line. For to lessen read to turn back.

Recount. Dele all after Sparowe, l. 613, and read: A modified spelling; put for racount. = F. raconter, 'to tell, relate, report, rehearse;' Cotgrave. = F. re, again; a, lit. to; and conter, to relate. Thus it is from Re, a-(5), and Count.

Render, l. 2. For ro render read to render.

Resin, § γ. For βειν read βειν.

Riddle (2), l. 6. For Instead read Instead.

Rife, p. 510, l. 2. Read Ettmüller.

Roil, l. 2. Read occasionally.

Romaunt, l. 3. For La Roman read Le Roman.

Rosemary, l. 8. Read Nesselmann.

Rotary, l. 8. Read άππα.

Rote (2), l. 4. Read Le Roman. l. 9. Read connects.

Round, last line. Dele sur-round. [See Surround.]

Row (2), l. 7. Read Der. row, sb., row-er; also rudder, q.v. But note that row-lock (pron. rud-uk) is an accommodated spelling of oar-lock, as shewn in the Addenda.

Sabaoth, ll. 2 and 3. Read ισαβ'όθ, armies; pl. of tsáva, an army. = Heb. tsáva, to go forth (as a soldier).

Saint, l. 5. Read Skt. saij. So also under Sake.

Salient, l. 3. Read heraldic.

Sandal, l. 5. Read Gk. σάβις, a board; rather, from Pers. sandal, &c.

Saracen. Add: Doubtful; much disputed.

Saunter, sect. γ. Dele this section, and substitute: γ. But a much more likely solution is that proposed in Mr. Blackley's Word-gossip, 1869, p. 227, and by Dr. Morris, in the Academy, April 14, 1883, p. 259. This is, to connect it with M. E. aunter, an adventure; cf. the quotation from Hudibras above. But I repudiate Mr. Blackley's suggestion: that the prefixed s is 'intensive,' which explains nothing. The verb to aunter was commonly reflexive; see P. Plowman, C. xxi. 232, xxiii. 175. Hence saunter may be explained from F. s'aventurer, to adventure oneself, to go forth on an adventure; since M. E. aunter = F. aventure. Otherwise the s = O. F. es = Lat. ex; so that s-aunter = venture forth. There is no difficulty in the change of sense; as Dr. Morris remarks, 'it is by no means a solitary example of degraded meaning; . . . the exploits or gests [of the old knights] have become our jests.'

Say (2), l. 7. Read Neuman. Last line but one; read Skt. saij.

Scale (3), l. 8. For ipso read ipso.

Scantling, last line but one. For cant,* from G. kante read *cant; cf. G. kante.

Scarce, l. 9. Read Diez remarks that participles with -sus for -tus are common in Low Latin.

Schism, l. 5. Read σχίσις.

Schooner, l. 10. Read Massachusetts.

Science, l. 3. For scienti- read scient-.

Scowl, col. 2, l. 1. Read Du. schuilen.

Scripture, l. 5. Read writing; cf. Lat. scripturus, &c.

Sculpture, l. 4. Read sculptura, sculpture; cf. Lat. sculpturus, &c.

Secant, l. 2. For secant read secant-.

Septenary, l. 2. Dele = before A mathematical.

Sequence, l. 5. For sequenti-, crude form, read sequent-, stem.

Seraph, l. 7. For It does not seem, &c. read Or else from Heb. saráph, to burn; see the Addenda.

Shawm, l. 10. Read κάλαμος.

Sign, l. 6. Read signatura; cf. the fut. part. of signare, &c.

Silence, l. 3. For silenti-, crude form, read silent-, stem.

Sillabub, l. 3. Read exhilarating.

Sincere, l. 9. For será read cerá.

Siren, col. 2, l. 6. Read derived.

Skipper, l. 3. Read Howell.

Sloop, l. 6. Dele the last word in the line.

Slot (1), p. 564, l. 2. Read ge-sloten, not ges-loten.

Sloven, l. 4. After Garland of Laurel, 191., continue: M. E. sloveyn, Coventry Myst. p. 218. The suffix -eyn = F. -ain, from Lat. -anus, as in M. E. scriv-ein = O. F. escriv-ain, from Low Lat. scribanus; see Scrivener. This O. F. suffix may have been added at first to give the word an adjectival force; &c.

Slut, l. 2. Read Coventry Myst. p. 218; scutte, p. 404; and in Palsgrave.

Smirk. To be marked as (E.)

Smug, sect. γ. l. 2. Read change from.

Snarl, l. 8. For ratling read rattling.

Terror, l. 5. Read Allied to terrere, to frighten, to scare; orig., &c.

Theism, l. 6. Read θέσσωσθαι.

Theogony, ll. 7 and 8. Read I became.

Thill, ll. 22 to 25. Read and the connection of deal with thill is now certain. No doubt the Du. deel, meaning a plank, board, is the same as E. deal, in the same sense, as shewn in the Addenda, under Deal (2). We must not in any way connect Du. deel, a plank, with Du. deel, a division, share, as I erroneously proposed to do in the first edition; the words are of different genders.

Thurible, ll. 7 and 10. Read θύ-ος, θύος.
Tide, l. 10. Read δά-σασθαι.
Tight, l. 7 from end. Read στεντός.
To-, prefix, l. 5 from end. For 'duo, to' read 'duo, two.'

Tortoise, l. 2 from end. For tortuga read tortuca.
Toxicology, last line. Read toxicologi-c-al, toxicolog-ist.
Tragedy, l. 14. Read θῆδς. Last line: read τράγ-ος.
Trailbaston, l. 5 to end. This is wrong; read: It would seem that the word was considered as a compound of O. F. tray (= Lat. trahē), give up, and baston, a wand of office, because many unjust officers were deprived of their offices. But this view is proved to be wrong by the passage from Langtoft's Chronicle, printed in Polit. Songs, ed. Wright, p. 318; on which see Wright's note, p. 383. The Anglo-F. word was traybastoun, traylebastoun, or trayllebastoun, meaning 'trail-stick' or 'stick-carrier'; id. pp. 231, 233, 319. See Trail and Baton; and see Addenda.

Trash, last two lines. Read This throws a light on trash, as in Shak. Temp. i. 2. 81, which may mean to-trim or lop.

Trireme, l. 6. Read τρίηρης.

Truck (1), l. 4 from end. Read τρόχος.
Truckle, l. 6. Read Butler's Hudibras, pt. iii. c. i. l. 613.
Trunk, l. 11. Read: The elephant's trunk owes its name to an error (see Addenda).

Turkey, l. 1. Read (F., -Tatar). L. 8 from end, delete the words within the square bracket, and read: -Tatar turk, orig. meaning 'brave.' [The Turkish word for Turk is 'osmánkí'. Cf. Pers. turk, &c.]

Turquoise, ll. 2 and 10. For Pers. read Tatar.
Twelve, ll. 13 to 17. Read: Again, the Lithuan. lika is due to the adj. lėkas, signifying 'what is over,' or 'remaining over'; see Nesselmann, p. 365. The phrase antras lėkas, lit. 'second one over,' is used as an ordinal, meaning 'twelfth.' Lėkas is from lik-ti, to leave, allied to Lat. linquere. See Eleven.

Twinkle, l. 1. Insert (E.)

Ukase, ll. 2, 3. Put u for y in ykaz', &c.
Ullage, l. 1. Read (F., -L., -Gk.) L. 4 to end, for I suppose, &c. read The same word as Lyonnais ouillier, oulier, to oil, also to fill to the brim. When a flask is nearly full, the people of the S. of France add a little oil to prevent evaporation, so that 'to oil' is also 'to fill up'; Wedgwood. -O. F. oile, oil. -Lat. oleum. -Gk. ἐλαιον. See Oil.

Umbel, l. 3 from the end. Read Fitzwilliam.
Undertake, l. 7. For have read has.
Uneath, l. 2. Read id. i. 11. 4.
Universal, l. 9. Read univers-i-ty, orig. a community, corporation, M. E. uniuersite, &c.

Visit, l. 3. Read uisere.

Wainscot, sect. β. Read [The rest of this article is wrong, being founded on a misconception; for the correct account, see the Addenda.]

Waist, l. 7. For a A. S. read an A. S.
Wanion, ll. 3 to 5. Read: The word has been explained by Wedgwood, Phil. Soc. Trans. 1873-4, p. 328. I myself independently obtained the same conclusions, viz. (1) that it stands, &c.
Wassail, l. 1. For Brande read Brand.

Wave (1), l. 14, first word. Read vofa.
Wax (1), l. 8. Read αὐτᾶν.
Wednesday, l. 12. For as late as in read late, as in. [In fact, there are later examples.]

Wipe, l. 5. For casual read causal.
Wisecre, l. 6. For uidere read uidere.
Wrinkle (1), last line but one. For + read Cf.
Wry, l. 6 from end. For verb read base.

Year, l. 9. Read ἔτα.
Yearn (1), l. 11. Read χαρά.
Ywis, l. 4 from end. For gauge read gauge.
Zodiac, Zoology. Read ζῳδιον, ζῳον.

⊕ MUTUAL RELATION OF PREFIXES: 13 (β). Read Skt. pari, Gk. πρί, Zend pairi (in para-dise).

LIST OF ARYAN ROOTS: p. 730. Gutturals, &c. For kh read gh; for th read dh; for ph read bh; and repeat these corrections throughout.

Root 14, p. 731, l. 2. Read ἄν-τεψ.
 Root 19, l. 4. Read ἀρ-μῶς.
 Root 24. Add—But see Arena in the Errata.
 Root 38, l. 2. Read εῖ-ειν.
 Root 72, p. 732. Delete hive, and insert cay.
 Root 198, p. 737, l. 4. For having a little share read preparing little.
 Root 227, p. 738, l. 3. For fa-gus read fag-us.
 Root 304, p. 741, l. 3. Read to make a noise.

DISTRIBUTION OF WORDS. English. Delete arrant, beck (1), cowl (1), craven, hull (2), pose (3), rankle; and (at the very end) filibuster. But insert clap, gavelkind, hod, hog. Low German. Insert French from Low German: paw? Dutch. Insert hull (2); and (at the very end) dele crucible: inserting Spanish from English from Dutch: filibuster. Scandinavian. Delete clap, hawser (halser), litter (3), and (last line—but one) union. Insert Russian from Scandinavian: knout. German. Delete (French from German) allure, hod. Insert (French from Old High German) grail (3), hemshaw (1). Teutonic. Delete widgeon; insert broil (1). At end of Italian from Teutonic, add: perhaps union. Celtic. Delete gavelkind, hog, paw, pink (1), pink (3), pot, pretty; (Welsh) funnel, pawl. After ingle insert from Latin. Insert (French from Celtic) beck (1), crucible; (French from Spanish from Celtic) barricade. Romance Languages. Delete broil (1); insert lawn (2). Insert galloon under French from Spanish, not under Spanish. Latin. For abstruce read abstruse. Delete farm, suburb; insert cowl (1), pawl. French from Latin (p. 754). Delete allay, bulb, grail (3), lawn (2), ullage; insert appal, arrant, cockney, craven, farm, funnel, hawser, jaunty, litter (3), noose, parch, rankle, suburb, widgeon. Provençal from Latin (p. 757). Add: see flamingo. Italian from Latin (p. 757). Delete spinach, spinage; and insert (French from Italian from Latin) carnation. Spanish from Latin (p. 757). Delete flamingo; insert lasso. Portuguese from Latin. Delete lasso. Celtic from Latin (p. 757, col. 2). Insert ingle, pink (1), pink (3), pot. Greek. Delete ammonia, ammonite. Insert (Latin from Greek) diatribe. Delete (French from Latin from Greek) balm, gum (2), shallot, shalot; inserting bulb, ullage. Insert (Celtic from Latin from Greek) pretty. Delete (Spanish from Greek) argosy. Insert Portuguese from Spanish from Arabic from Greek: albatross. Slavonic. Delete (Russian) knout. Insert: Dalmatian: argosy. Asiatic Aryan Languages. Delete (Persian) tartar (2); (French from Persian) turkey. Insert: French from Spanish from Arabic from Persian: spinach. For French from Turkish from Persian: horde, read French from Arabic from Persian: azure. Insert: Hindustani from Sanskrit: jungle: deleting 'jungle' under Sanskrit.

European Non-Aryan Languages. Add: Turkish: horde, turkey. Semitic Languages. Delete (Arabic) amber, jordan; (French from Portuguese from Arabic), albatross. Insert (Latin from Greek from Hebrew) balsam, cassia, jordan; (French from Latin from Greek from Hebrew) balm, jenneting; (French from Spanish from Arabic) amber. Asiatic Non-Aryan Languages. Delete (Hindustani) coolie, cooly; (and perhaps Hindustani should be reckoned as Aryan). Insert: Hindustani from Tamil: coolie (cooly); also (Persian from Tatar) tartar (2). African Languages. Insert (French from Latin from Greek from Egyptian) gum (2). Hybrid Words. Delete appal; insert allure. Etymology unknown. Delete cockney, jenneting, noose, parch; and see Pole-cat in Addenda.

LIST OF HOMONYMS. The following, being wrongly marked formerly, should be marked as follows. Beck (1); F., -C. Cowl (1); L. Deal (1), a share (E.); see Deal (3) in Errata. Gage (2), to gauge (not gauge). Grail (3); F., -O.
